ticular client; and (3) the broker so dealt with the stock throughout the currency of the accounts that in the result there was a large shortage in the mass of transactions. In *Gillies's*¹ case the ground of judgment was, that the broker had failed to enter into real transactions for his principal. In *Robinson's*² case part of the tallow from which the broker intended to supply his client's order had been already purchased by him prior to receiving the order. (1) As regarded the original purchases.—Iron, as ordered by the defender, was bought for

No. 164.
June 16, 1897.
Clavering,
Son, & Co. v.
Hope.

selves would have been entitled to charge a commission of 1/8th per cent, but state No. 246 of process, and the evidence of Mr Wilson, the secretary of the Iron Trade Association, shew that this mode would have been more expensive to the defender than the mode adopted. The evidence of Mr Wilson also shews that the mode adopted is well known in the market; it is that which he himself invariably follows. I think the pursuers have succeeded in proving that it is usual and reasonable; and the only kind of criticism upon it which the defender made in his evidence was that it might have enabled the pursuers to do things which nobody says they did, and might have prevented the defender from doing things which he never attempted to do.

"But it seems to me that the conclusive answer to the defender's argument is that he had ample notice of the pursuers' mode of carrying over, and did not object to it at the time. He was no novice either as a 'bull' or as a 'bear' in the iron market, and his protestations of ignorance do not impress me favourably.

"The member of the pursuers' firm who was examined says that the very same system was followed in their former dealings with the defender, and Nos. 154 and 155 of process bear out his statement, for these are bought and sold notes in exactly the same terms as those sent to the defender after 26th August 1895. Even if there had been no prior course of dealing, the terms of the notes were, I think, a plain announcement that the pursuers had themselves taken up the iron. They bore that the iron was bought from and sold to the defender by the pursuers, and they contained no charge for commission. Moreover, the pursuers' letter of 30th September said distinctly,—'It is quite impossible for us to go on holding your iron'; and there were subsequent letters to the same effect. It is a mere play upon words to say that any differences went into the pursuers' pockets. Inasmuch as they had paid for the iron which the defender had bought, they were of course entitled to be recouped, and for that purpose to take not merely the prices which were paid when the iron was ultimately sold on the defender's order, but to recover from him the amount by which the latter prices fell short of the former. That was merely reimbursement, not profit. The only sums which in any proper sense went into the pursuers' pocket were the commissions which were due on the original purchases and the ultimate sales, plus the carry-over charge of 3d. per ton, representing storage rent and interest; and the latter charge, or its equivalent, would have been payable to any person who advanced the price and took up the iron.

"Even if the case had been one of an isolated transaction, and the defence had been stated at once, it would have been stated in much less favourable circumstances than the defence in Robinson v. Mollett. But to sustain it after a course of dealing extending over years, and in circumstances which (in my opinion) clearly point to knowledge on the part of the defender, would be to pervert a salutary rule of law to uses for which it was never intended. I shall therefore repel the defences, and give decree as concluded for, with expenses."

¹ Gillies v. McLean, 13 R. 12.

² Robinson v. Mollet, 7 Eng. and Irish App. 802.

No. 164.

June 16, 1897.
Clavering,
Son, & Co. v.
Hope.

him, and at the prices authorised by him, and he could have enforced the contracts for it against the pursuers, and he also had materials for a claim against the selling broker, or the constituent behind him, if he had one. The orders received by the pursuers were cumulative orders for the defender himself and for his friends, and the system of averaging was not only justified but was the only workable system for ascertaining the price. The defender's argument was based on a misconception as to the purpose and effect of an advice-note. An advice-note was not a contract but a notification to the client of a contract made for him. In all cases the information contained in these documents was accurate. (2) As to the carry-over contracts.—There was no particular method ordained by law for effecting them. The transaction could be done either with the original selling broker, or with a third party, or with the broker himself. The commonest way of effecting the carry-over was for the broker himself to take over the purchase and hold it for his client; indeed it was incumbent upon him to do so if neither the original seller nor a third person was willing to do so. Now, was he in such circumstances to forfeit his rights under his brokerage contract? The answer to the argument as to the broker's adverse interest in case of a scarcity of the commodity bought was that in this case the defender could have had the warrants for his iron had he desired to take it up. But, in any view, the evidence was irresistible, that the defender knew and acquiesced in the method in which the carry-overs were effected. The form of the contracts was sufficient notice to him, and the expressions in the correspondence, coupled with the absence of a brokerage commission in the carry-over contracts, must have shewn him that the pursuers were acting as principals in the carry-overs. It was proved that he was no novice in buying and selling in the iron market. The Lord Ordinary's judgment was right.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defender, who has been in use for a considerable time to engage in speculations in the Scottish iron market, employed the pursuers as brokers to buy certain quantities of iron, partly for himself and partly for others named by him to them. These purchases he directed from time to time to be carried over from one settling day to another. The pursuers being unable to obtain a settlement with the defender for their claims against him, have raised this action. The defender pleads that they are not entitled to decree against him, and this upon two grounds—(1) that they did not make purchases for him at the prices stated, and (2) that they did not continue in the character in which he employed them, but became truly principals in the transactions, which was contrary to their duty under his contract with them as brokers.

As regards the first of these contentions, the course of procedure seems to have been this—The pursuers having received the defender's order to buy a certain quantity of iron for himself and a certain quantity for a friend, went into the market and purchased such lots as they found offered. They then struck an average of the prices at which they had been able to obtain the iron, and charged the defender with the price so ascertained. It is therefore true that the price so notified to him did not always exactly correspond with the price at which any individual lot was bought, but, on the other hand, they did charge him with the proportion of the whole lumped price applicable to the quantity he had desired them to purchase for him. The question is whether that was a proceeding of which the defender can complain as being a wrong done to him in breach of the pursuers' duty as brokers. I am unable to see any ground for so holding. If the brokers' clients, whoever they might be, sent to him a number of orders which reached him at one time, and he went into the market to buy, and could only get the quantities required by making several purchases, some of which were at different prices from others owing to the rapid fluctuations of the market, it is difficult to see how he could act fairly by his clients otherwise than by putting together the prices of the whole and charging each with his proportion applicable to the quantity he ordered. That was truly the price at which he obtained the goods, for it could hardly be said that the first lot he obtained was to go to the client whose order, by the accident of his picking up a particular letter first from his desk, came first before him, to the detriment of other clients whose instructions had reached him by the same post. In this particular case, where the defender ordered a purchase for himself and others, the actual orders were simultaneous, and accordingly I can see nothing but what was fair and right in this mode of stating the purchases, and nothing to exclude the pursuers from maintaining their claim on the employment of them by the defender to make the purchases which they did.

No. 164.
June 16, 1897.
Clavering,
Son, & Co. v.
Hope.

The defender maintains that the course which the pursuers followed placed him in the position that he had no contracts made for him by them that he could have enforced—that the contracts of which they professed to give him notice by the advice-notes bore to be for prices not the same as those at which they made the contracts. This certainly is so. It is conceivable that in certain contingencies the defender, if he had required to work out his purchases from the sellers himself, might have had to pay in some cases more than the price at which the pursuers notified him of the purchases, the difference arising from the mode of averaging which they adopted. If it were necessary in the circumstances of this case to deal with any such question, it would, I think, be not unattended with difficulty. If any question had arisen of the enforcement by the defender of contracts entered into by the pursuers for him, I am not prepared to say that there might not have been serious questions not easy of solution. But here in actual fact no such questions did arise. The ventures into which the defender entered through the pursuers were worked out, the defender being unable to shew that any prejudice resulted to him from anything that was done in their initiation. The course which the pursuers took was in every way an equitable and a just one, and the working out of the transactions having taken place without any difficulty such as is suggested, I am unable to see ground for holding that the defender is entitled to throw upon the pursuers loss incurred in carrying on his business, they all through acting in an open and straightforward manner, which in no way tended to cause loss or to increase loss in the speculations ordered by him to be entered into and carried on from time to time with his knowledge, and without any objection.

But, secondly, it is said that the pursuers cannot maintain their claim because of the course they took in carrying over transactions which the

No. 164. defender was not prepared to settle at the proper settling time. The mode in which they proceeded is shewn in the documents produced. These were —(His Lordship read the carry-over bought and sold notes quoted above). These documents are most plain upon the face of them, and I am unable to accept the view that they were not perfectly understood by the defender. The transaction is plain enough. The pursuers buy from the defender at the market price of the day, and sell to him for a settlement on a later date at a price 3d. per ton higher than that price,—the sum of 3d. being divisible into 1d. for storage rent for the time, and 2d. for interest on money. And the pursuers, in their letters to the defender following on these bought and sold notes, refer again and again to their holding the iron as the defender's iron. "We cannot continue to hold your iron," they say, time after time. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that it cannot be taken off the defender's hands that he did not understand and acquiesce in this mode of dealing with his business, which is proved to be a mode usual in practice, and which could not prejudice the defender. Indeed, it appears that it worked out more cheaply to him than another mode would have done.

June 16, 1897.
Clavering,
Son, & Co. v.
Hope.

I do not lay weight on the evidence that this is a mode of working out carrying-over transactions which is customary in the association of which the pursuers are members. For although it is the fact that the documents upon the face of them bore that the transactions were "subject to the rules and usages of the Scotch Pig Iron Trade Association," the defenders may not be bound by the procedure of that association to submit to anything that would truly change the character of the agency-contract undertaken by the pursuers.

I accept to the full the principle that a broker is not entitled to allocate goods belonging to himself as fulfilment of his instructions to buy for his client in the market. But that is not the nature of the proceeding here. The pursuers in the first instance made the purchases from principals, and notified these purchases as the fulfilment of the defender's orders. It was only when settlement was not made by the defender that the course was followed which was disclosed in the bought and sold notes to which I have referred. The mode of carry over brought nothing to the pursuers, except the 2d. per ton on each occasion, and this coming in lieu of a business commission was, it appears, more favourable to the defender. And, as I have said, it was known to him, and, I hold, acquiesced in by him.

I think that the pursuers have been successful in shewing that this is a usual and accepted mode of dealing with carry-over transactions. The pursuers admit that the warrants for the iron were lodged with their bank. But if the defender had supplied them with funds to meet any of the purchases, the warrants could have been exchanged for the money and made over to him. There is nothing in the evidence tending to shew that the defender had not the iron he had ordered available to him at any time he might come forward with the price and seek delivery. And I think the defender has failed to shew any damage that resulted or could result to him from the procedure which was fully disclosed to him, and to which he stated no objection.

I think there is great force in the argument used by Mr Balfour, that a broker in such a case as this might be placed in an enforced position to do as was done here. For if he could not find a buyer for the carry-over No. 164. on reasonable terms, he might be compelled to pay himself, and so become a buyer. For he had either to pay or find a buyer or take over himself.

June 16, 1897.
Clavering,
Son, & Co. v.
Hope.

The result of my opinion is that I move your Lordships to refuse the reclaiming note, and to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I concur generally in the note of the Lord Ordinary in which he explains the grounds of his judgment.

I think this is not only an honest claim on the part of the pursuers, but that upon the facts it is a good legal claim, meaning thereby that the legal objections to it are not well founded. I think that the defence is not well founded in law, and that it is clearly not well founded in fact, and that on the grounds which the Lord Ordinary and your Lordship have both explained. It is established to my satisfaction, as well as that of the Lord Ordinary and of your Lordship, that the pursuers here never upon any occasion in the conduct of the defender's business acted on their own account for themselves, or with a view to their own profit or taking the risk of loss. In everything which they did, although they got occasionally into the position of a principal, they were acting upon employment as brokers, and doing the business of their client as such, and solely with a view to their client's interest, and with no eye to their own. It is matter of certain fact upon the evidence that brokers dealing in this commodity upon the Glasgow Iron Exchange or in the Glasgow iron market act as principals with respect to each other—that is to say, that while they may look to their clients or employers for relief and indemnity, they are bound to each other as principals, and that when one broker buys from another, although the one is buying and the other selling really in the interest and for behoof of third parties who employ them, they stand to each other in the relations of principals who must fulfil their contracts. Now, when the pursuers were instructed as brokers to purchase iron for the defender, and they did purchase it, they were under obligation as principals to fulfil that contract. They were ordered to purchase a certain quantity—take the first instance in 1895 of this renewed employment—they were instructed to purchase a certain quantity of iron deliverable in a month. The purchase price was communicated to the defender. I do not deal with the fact of averaging at this moment, but lay that aside. They purchased the goods for the defender, although they were bound as principals to the party from whom they bought, and when the month elapsed it was for the defender, who had given instructions in the matter, to provide them with money to take up the iron if he wished to have it. There is nothing to give the least countenance to the suggestion as a possibility—there is nothing to give the least countenance to it as a matter of fact—that had he desired to implement this purchase, and been prepared to send money to his brokers to pay for the iron and to take it up, he could not have got it at the market price which was paid for it, and of which he had got notice. But that did not suit him; he did not wish to take it up, and therefore it had to be carried over, but his brokers being bound as principals to the seller had to pay for it, although they were not supplied with money by their client to pay for it. They had two courses open to them no

No. 164. doubt. The one was to pay for it themselves and hold it for their client for a month, or get somebody else to supply the money and take it and hold it for their client for a month. It is, according to the evidence, a common way—I rather think it is the most common and the most beneficial way for the client and the broker—that the broker should pay for it with his own money and hold it over for his client. Well, there is the opportunity to advance the argument,—“Ah, then he becomes a principal.” I do not think there was anything wrong in that; I think it was according to the pursuers’ employment that when they were instructed to carry it over they should do it in a way beneficial to their client. It was certainly as much to his advantage as any other method would have been. In regard to repetitions, it is just the same thing. It is according to the evidence that every repetition of it was upon the most moderate terms which prevailed upon the Iron Exchange at the time. It could not have been done more cheaply for their client and in the interest of their client. With respect to the defender’s statement that he did not know, I know nothing about the defender any more than about the pursuers, and I am always sorry to concur in any observation, or to make any observation, which imputes what is discreditable to anybody, but I must concur in the observation of the Lord Ordinary in his note, that the “defender was no novice either as a ‘bull’ or as a ‘bear,’ and his protestations of ignorance do not impress me favourably.” That means in plainer language that the Lord Ordinary did not believe him, and I certainly do not believe him. I think he knew what was being done perfectly well. I marked in the course of the discussion, I think, three passages, and there are others. To turn to the letter dated 30th September 1895—Clavering, Son, & Company to J. A Hope & Company,—“We have your favour of yesterday’s date, and your wires of this morning. It is quite impossible for us to go on holding your iron. You must either pay us the margin in a proper way or we shall certainly sell.” That is a pretty distinct intimation that they were holding it. Then the next letter I had marked is dated 14th October 1895, and in it the pursuers say,—“We enclose account shewing how you stand, and we shall be glad of a cheque to bring us up to the point agreed upon, for with our small commission we cannot afford to run risks.” Then in another of the same date they say,—“We send you an account shewing £462, 6s. 2d. This is keeping the agreed-on margin of 1s. per ton and differences due. We hope you will send us this amount, as we cannot hold on to the iron and take the risk of the market.” And in a letter dated 17th October 1895 they say,—“We are disappointed at not hearing from you according to your promise when here. We cannot hold the iron unless the margin is paid and kept up. We wired you the price this morning,” and so on. Now, it is impossible, I think, to differ from the Lord Ordinary in disregarding the protestations of the defender here that he did not know they were holding the iron at all, or really had anything to do with it except buying as mere agents or selling as mere agents. I think they were agents, according to the custom of the market, of their client, the defender, in carrying over the speculative operations which he had employed them for, and that he knew thoroughly all that was being done, in his interest, and in his interest alone, and without the pursuers having any eye whatever to speculation for themselves.

June 16, 1897.
Clavering,
Son, & Co. v.
Hope.

As to averaging, I may say that I concur, and do not dwell upon the subject, in the view of the Lord Ordinary. I think when an order is sent by a man, by a friend, or by himself alone, for a certain quantity of iron, it is quite fair and legitimate in the broker to buy it in what he considers the most favourable circumstances, and to the best advantage of his client, and if the prices of different quantities which may not correspond with the exact quantities ordered for any one of them are different, it is altogether legitimate to average these, and to charge two, three, or four clients with the fair average of the prices that have been paid in making the purchases upon their account. That really is the whole case, and I repeat that, in my opinion, it is proved clearly that this is an honest action by honest brokers for a sum due to them for business done by them in the interest of their client alone, and without any reference whatever to themselves except as regards their commission; that the defender knew that, and that the defence upon the technical grounds—for I call them so—which was stated to us is not a defence which any Court would willingly support if they could legitimately see their way to do justice to the party who was acting honestly in the matter.

No. 164.
June 16, 1897.
Clavering,
Son, & Co. v.
Hope.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think this case is attended with considerable difficulty. I cannot concur in the views expressed by the Lord Ordinary, but I think the conclusion at which he has arrived is in accordance with the justice of the case.

LORD MONCREIFF.—Notwithstanding the able and ingenious argument for the reclaimer, I agree in thinking that we should affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The proof does not disclose that the defender sustained any loss in consequence of the pursuers' operations as his brokers; but this would not avail the pursuers if it were proved that they failed to discharge their duty as brokers and departed from the rules and regulations of the Exchange without the knowledge and consent of their principal. I am satisfied, however, that on all points the defender fails; and first as to the original contracts. The state in Appendix A shews that the contracts in question, ranging from 26th August 1895 to 3d February 1896, both inclusive, were eleven in number. It is distinctly proved that all these were bona fide purchases made by the pursuers on the employment of and for the defender. The defender makes various objections. He says that in some cases he was not given the names of the sellers; that in others the price named to him was an average of two lots purchased by the pursuers; and that the quantities which were represented to have been purchased for him were in some cases only parts of larger quantities purchased by the pursuers. He maintains that in these circumstances he would have had no direct right of action against the sellers, who might have refused to carry out a sale of less than the whole quantity agreed on with the pursuers, or at a different price. If a question had arisen with the original sellers there might have been some practical difficulty in enforcing these sales. But it is sufficient to say that no question ever arose with the original sellers, because the sales were all carried out and the warrants obtained by the pursuers for cash paid on behalf of the defender, and the iron was there if the defender chose to take it up.

No. 164.

June 16, 1897.
Clavering,
Son, & Co. v.
Hope.

As to the practice of averaging, there is evidence to shew that the defender was well aware that this was being done. (Compare letter pursuers to defender of 6th September 1895 with contract-notes of same date; and see also contract-note of 4th September 1895.)

In regard to the carrying-over, the defender's objection is that the pursuers acted as principals, and that therefore, according to the authorities, they are not entitled to recover. The pursuers' answer is, that in doing so they acted in accordance with the practice of the Scottish Pig Iron Trade Association, and that the defender was throughout apprised of their position by the terms of the carry-over contracts which the pursuer sent to him. I think that this is borne out by the evidence and the documents. The practice is thus described by the witness Wilson, secretary of the Iron Trade Association—(His Lordship read the passage from Mr Wilson's evidence quoted above).

Now, if it had been shewn that this practice was unknown to the defender, and that he was not aware that the pursuers were following it in carrying over, he might not have been bound, even although no loss was caused, by that system being adopted. The form of the carry-over contracts must have made it quite plain to the defender that the pursuers were acting as principals, because they all bear to be "bought from" and "sold to" Messrs J. A. Hope & Company, and not bought for or sold for them. The pursuers say—and there is no evidence to the contrary—that they had warrants with which they could at any time have implemented the sales had their client desired it.

The facts of the case being as I have stated, it is clearly distinguished from the cases relied on by the defender—*Robinson v. Mollett*¹ and *Maffet v. Stewart and Others*²—especially in this respect, that here it is proved that the defender was from time to time apprised both in regard to the averaging of prices and the footing on which the contracts were carried over. In agreeing that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be affirmed I proceed not so much on the complete bona fides of the pursuers, which I think has been established, as upon the thorough knowledge which I am satisfied the defender had of the mode in which his interests were being attended to.

THE COURT adhered.

MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—DRUMMOND & REID, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 165.

ANDREW MUIR (William Brown's Trustee), First Party.—

Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Craigie.

June 18, 1897.
Brown's
Trustee v.
Brown.

JOHN BROWN AND TUTOR AD LITEM, Second Parties.—W. Campbell—Graham Stewart.

Minor—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Sale of heritage by factor loco tutoris—Minor's power to test on proceeds of sale.—A minor pubes may dispose by will of moveable property belonging to him as a surrogatum for heritage.

A factor loco tutoris to A B during A B's pupillarity sold as an act of administration an inn to which A B had succeeded as heir-at-law. After attaining puberty A B executed a will disposing of his whole property.

Held that although the proceeds of the sale were to be regarded as a surrogatum for heritage, being in fact moveable property belonging to A B, No. 165. he was entitled after puberty to dispose of it by will, and had done so.

¹ L. R., 7 Eng. and Irish App. 802.

² 14 R. 506.

Observed that if the property had not been sold, A B would have been on attaining puberty entitled to sell it, and to dispose of the proceeds by will. June 18, 1897.
Brown's
Trustee v.
Brown.

JOHN BROWN, innkeeper, Cross Keys Inn, Perth, died on 5th September 1894, intestate, predeceased by his wife, and survived by eight children—four sons and four daughters. William, born on 7th June 1882, was the eldest son. 1ST DIVISION.

At the date of his death John Brown was possessed of the Cross Keys Inn, Bridgend, Perth, in which he carried on business as an innkeeper, and of moveable estate amounting to somewhat less than £200.

William, as his father's heir in heritage, succeeded to the inn. On 6th November 1894 William James Wood, accountant, Perth, was appointed factor loco tutoris to William Brown, and, for some time after his appointment, he carried on the business of innkeeper in the inn by the aid of a servant. Wood presented an application to the Sheriff of Perthshire for power to sell the inn, suggesting, in view of the great risk attending licensed property, that the property should be sold. He also set forth that, if the property lost the licence, as might easily occur through the neglect or fault of the barman, the result would be a very serious loss to the estate, as a very small rent could be got for it if deprived of the licence, and further that, as the personal estate of the deceased was of small value and there was a large family, William Brown or the applicant might be called on to alimnt the other children; and that, while a price could then be obtained sufficient, if safely invested, to maintain them in comparative comfort, the result of the licence being lost would be most disastrous to them all. The Accountant of Court, on 30th January 1895, having reported favourably on the application, power to sell was granted by the Sheriff, and, on 25th March 1895, the inn was sold for £2140, and the free proceeds of the sale were invested by Wood in name of his ward, partly on heritable security and partly in Three per Cent Canadian Inscribed Stock.

William Brown attained the age of fourteen on 27th June 1896. On the 30th July 1896 he executed a holograph settlement in the following terms:—"I hereby assign my whole property, in the event of my death, to Andrew Muir, brewer, Perth, as my trustee and executor, in order that he may realise the same, and divide it equally among my brothers and sisters who may then be alive.—WILLIAM BROWN, 30th July 1896."

William Brown died on 29th October 1896, survived by three sisters and two brothers.

Questions having arisen as to the succession to the free proceeds of the sale of the inn, this special case was presented by (1) William Brown's executor, and (2) his heir-at-law, his immediate younger brother John, who was in pupillarity.

The case, after setting forth the above facts, further stated,—“When the said William Brown executed said settlement, as well as at the date of his death, he had no interest in any estate other than the free proceeds of said sale. He was aware that the heritable property had been sold. Prior to his making the said settlement, he was informed by his legal adviser that, if he died intestate, his property might fall to his younger brother, and he thereupon stated his desire that his estate should be divided equally among his brothers and sisters, and he thereafter executed the said settlement.”

No. 165. The first party maintained that the free proceeds were moveable estate in the person of William Brown, at the date of his death, in respect (a) that the sale of the inn was in reality a compulsory one; (b) that the free proceeds fell to be administered in terms of the settlement of William Brown, he having approved of and ratified the sale; and (c) that, in any event, the proceeds were carried by the deceased's settlement. The second party, on the other hand, maintained that the free proceeds were heritable estate in the person of his brother William Brown, at the date of his death; that no part thereof was carried by his settlement, but that the proceeds fell to him as his brother's heir-at-law in heritage.

June 18, 1897.
Brown's
Trustee v.
Brown.

The questions of law submitted for the opinion of the Court were,— “1. Are the free proceeds derived from the sale of the said Cross Keys Inn payable to the first party, in order that they may be distributed by him in terms of the settlement of the said William Brown? or
2. Do said free proceeds now fall to the second party as heir-at-law in heritage of the said deceased William Brown?”

On 18th March 1897 the Court appointed Mr James Adam, advocate, as tutor ad litem to the second party, and he by minute adopted the special case as adjusted on behalf of his ward.

Argued for the first party;—No doubt there must be “weighty reasons”¹ for the sale by a tutor of his ward's estate in order to operate conversion. But these existed here. The sale was not a mere act of temporary administration during the subsistence of the curatory, but it was a compulsory sale which the tutor was bound to make. The sale having then operated conversion, the proceeds were moveable, and the deceased had ratified it on attaining minority by assigning his whole property (and the proceeds of the inn were all that he had) to be divided, in terms of his settlement, amongst his brothers and sisters. In any view, the rule that a minor could not convey heritage only applied to subjects which were proper heritage, e.g., it did not apply to subjects which were heritable destinatione.²

Argued for the second party;—(1) Nothing short of a compulsory sale was sufficient to convert property quoad succession from heritable to moveable. Here the most which could be said was that the sale was expedient in the interests of the estate; but mere expediency, even although it amounted to a duty in the tutor, was not sufficient. The sale of the inn then did not operate conversion, and the proceeds were heritable in the person of the deceased at the time of his death. (2) The deceased had not adopted the sale. In the first place, he had no power to do so so as to enable him to test upon the price. It was well settled that a tutor could not change what was heritable into moveable in order to enable his ward to regulate his succession by testament on his arriving at puberty, a minor pubes not being entitled to make a settlement of his heritage.³ In the second place, the deceased had not in fact adopted the sale. In order to such adoption the deceased must have ratified the sale by some overt act. All he had done was to express his desire that his brothers and sisters should succeed to his estate, and that was not enough.

¹ Ersk. Inst. i. 8, 17; Accountant of Court v. Gilroy, May 21, 1872, 10 Macph. 715, 44 Scot. Jur. 392; Buntine's Curator, July 13, 1870, 8 Macph. 976.

² Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees, Dec. 19, 1874, 2 R. 258, per Lord Gifford, 271, and March 16, 1876, 3 R. (H. L.) 16.

³ Sharp v. Crichton, July 19, 1671, M. 16,285; Advocate-General v. Anstruther, July 2, 1842, 13 D. 450, per Lord Ivory, 454; Fraser on Parent and Child, p. 261; Erskine's Inst. i. 7, 18; McLaren on Wills and Succession, vol. i. 238.

No. 165.
June 18, 1897.
Brown's
Trustee v.
Brown.

LORD ADAM.—The facts which raise the questions, or rather the question, of law in this case are simple.

William died on the 29th October 1896. He was possessed of no other property than the proceeds of the sale of the inn.

The question of law is whether the proceeds of the sale of the inn were validly disposed of by the settlement executed by the minor.

The parties to the case are Mr Muir, the trustee named in the settlement, of the first part, who maintains the validity of the settlement, and John Brown, William's immediate younger brother and heir-at-law, who maintains that the proceeds of the sale in question were heritable estate in the person of his brother, and were not carried by the settlement.

Now, I think that if William had died intestate, the proceeds of the sale, being the surrogatum for heritable estate belonging to the pupil sold during his pupillarity, would have gone to his heir-at-law. The sale was not a compulsory sale. I do not in the least doubt that the sale was a most expedient act by the tutor in the interest of his pupil, but nevertheless it was a mere act of administration, which it is quite settled does not affect the heir's right of succession.

But that is not the question in this case. The question is whether a minor who is in possession of what is in fact moveable estate, although it may be the surrogatum for heritable estate sold during his pupillarity, may not deal with it just as freely as he may with any other moveable estate belonging to him. He may invest it as he pleases; he may spend it as he pleases; and I see no reason why he may not dispose of it by will if he pleases. Moreover, it will be observed that even if the Cross Keys Inn had not been sold during his pupillarity, it was in the minor's power to have sold it, and if he had done so, to have disposed of the proceeds by will. When on attaining minority he found that the property had been already sold, and the price was in his possession, I see no reason why he should not equally have the power of disposing of it by will. No decision to the contrary effect was cited to us. I am therefore of opinion that the settlement in question was habile to convey the price of the inn to the trustee, and that the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative.

CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—JOHN HAY, Solicitor—Agents.

MRS ELLEN MURRAY, Pursuer (Appellant).—D. Dundas—Abel.
RENNIE & ANGUS, Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour—Salvesen.

No. 166.

Contract—Offer and Acceptance—Implied Condition—Undue delay in accepting.—In an action for implement of an offer to execute the mason Rennie & work required for the erection of a house in Aberdeen made by the defen- Angus.
June 18, 1897.
Murray v.

No. 166. der to the pursuer's architect on 10th June, and accepted by the pursuer on 21st June, the defender maintained that there was no concluded contract, in respect (1) that his offer had not been accepted within seven days as provided by one of a number of "conditions of tendering" agreed to by the architects and builders of Aberdeen; (2) and that in any view there had been undue delay in accepting his offer.

June 18, 1897.
Murray v.
Rennie &
Angus.

The condition founded on was in the following terms:—"7. That architects shall within seven days from date of lodging estimates (either by advertisement or otherwise) inform the contractors who have tendered for work as to who has been successful, and that contractors shall be held bound to abide by their estimates for the same time." After a proof held (1) that the so-called "conditions" were not to be regarded as implied conditions in building contracts in Aberdeen, but rather as rules for the guidance of architects; (2) that even if they were to be regarded as conditions, condition 7 contemplated cases where the whole tenders fell to be received by a definite date, and fixed seven days for the architect considering them, and did not apply to the defender's offer; and (3) that the offer had been accepted without undue delay, and was binding.

Question whether the offer might have been accepted at any time until it was withdrawn?

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.

MRS ELLEN MURRAY, wife of John Murray, builder in Aberdeen, having resolved to erect a dwelling-house there, had plans and specifications, and schedules of quantities prepared, which were submitted to various tradesmen in Aberdeen.

On 9th June 1896 a schedule of quantities of mason work, which bore to be for the house to be erected for Mrs Murray, and to be taken out by Messrs D. & J. R. M'Millan, architects, Aberdeen, was submitted to Rennie & Angus, masons in Aberdeen, who were members of the Master Masons' Association.

On 10th June Rennie & Angus wrote to Messrs M'Millan making offer to execute the mason work for £690.

Eleven days after, viz. on 21st June, Rennie & Angus received a letter from Mrs Murray accepting their offer, but Rennie & Angus declined to go on with the work.

Mrs Murray then, with concurrence of her husband, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen for implement of the contract, and for damages.

The defence was that the offer had not been accepted in due time.

The defenders averred that by "conditions of tendering made by the architects in Aberdeen and the respective associations connected with the building trade, and forming a condition of the present contract, it is provided '7. that architects shall within seven days of the date of lodging estimates (either by advertisement or otherwise) inform the contractors who have tendered for the work as to who has been successful, and that contractors shall be held bound to abide by their estimates for the same time.'"

* A copy of the "Conditions" was produced and put in evidence by the defenders. They were entitled,—“Conditions of tendering and forms of schedules relative to contracts agreed to by the architects in Aberdeen and the respective associations connected with the building trade.”

They contained eleven articles. Inter alia, they provided (art. 1) that every description of work to be contracted for should be scheduled, and that builders should refuse to offer for any such work, except the same had been scheduled.

(Art. 2) That a uniform system of measuring and scheduling suitable for the respective trades employed should be adopted.

The defenders pleaded ;—(1) The defenders' offer not having been accepted within seven days, as required by said conditions of tendering, or otherwise within a reasonable time, ipso facto fell, and consequently no contract was ever entered into.*

No. 166.

June 18, 1897.

Murray v.

Rennie &

Angus.

A proof was led, in which the facts above narrated were admitted or proved. Evidence was led in connection with the "conditions," the knowledge of the parties of their existence, and the custom of builders and others in regard to them, but for the purposes of this report it is unnecessary to refer further to the evidence.

On 4th January 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) assoilzied the defenders,† and on 25th February 1897 the Sheriff (Crawford) adhered.‡

(Art. 3) That all details, such as mouldings, &c., should, where practicable, be indicated by marginal sketches.

Appended to the conditions was the following :—"Note.—As many of the terms in the schedules are local on account of this being a granite district, parties to a stamped contract should see that the terms in general conditions, specifications, and schedule agree, and that the contract be fairly balanced as between proprietor and contractor, and generally, that the arbiter named be other than the architect or the engineer on the work."

* By joint minute the parties agreed that the pursuer should be allowed to accept the next highest offer for the work in question. This offer was for £701, 10s., being £11, 10s. in excess of the defenders' offer.

† "NOTE.— . . . The position taken by defenders now is that by general custom of the trade in Aberdeen such offers require to be accepted within seven days; if not, the offerer may consider that his offer is not accepted and that he is free to offer elsewhere. In proof of this they put in a book containing conditions of tendering in such contracts agreed to by the architects and builders in Aberdeen.

"No. 7 of the general conditions relative to contracts stated in this book is to the effect that architects shall within seven days from date of lodging estimates inform the contractors who have tendered as to who has been successful, and that contractors shall be bound by their estimates for that time. The various conditions specified in this book are alleged to govern the building trade in Aberdeen in these matters so far as not altered by special agreement, and it was stated that if altered in essential points builders would refuse to estimate.

"Indisputable evidence of two of the leading architects and two of the leading builders in Aberdeen was led to the effect that the conditions of tendering in this book were always kept in view as between architects and builders and their employers, and specially that the condition in question as to the seven days' limit was universally held as giving the tenderer the option of going on or not if seven days elapsed without his hearing anything of the result of his offer.

"As I have already pointed out, Messrs M'Millan, whose names were on the schedule of quantities on which defenders offered, are architects in Aberdeen, defenders are members of the Master Masons' Association, and in these circumstances it seems to me perfectly clear that defenders in making this offer as they did were entitled to assume that the condition referred to was incorporated in and was an implicit condition of their offer, and that therefore they were within their rights in declining to implement their offer when not accepted within seven days.

"It was sought to be maintained that nothing could be considered here except the simple words of the contract, the offer, and acceptance; but it

‡ "NOTE.—The defence in this action is mainly laid on the usage of trade, and if that is established no better criterion could be found for deciding

No. 166. The pursuer appealed to the First Division.

June 18, 1897.
Murray v.
Rennie &
Angus.

The arguments of the parties were to a great extent directed to the evidence and the questions arising thereon, but they sufficiently appear, so far as the questions decided by the Court are concerned, from the opinion of the Lord President.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The offer upon which the present action is founded was to build a house for £690. No time was specified in the offer as limiting the period of its subsistence. It was accepted within eleven days. The Sheriffs have held that the offer was binding for seven days and no longer. The judgments of both Sheriffs are founded on certain printed “conditions,” not expressly referred to in the offer or the acceptance, which they hold to express a usage or custom of the building trade in Aberdeen, to the effect that offers by builders are only binding for seven days. Both Sheriffs hold that the defenders’ offer was made in the knowledge of and in reliance on seems to me too clear for argument that a usage or rule of trade, such as is here in my opinion proved, may extend, limit, or qualify a contract, so long as the usage is consistent with law, and is reasonable, and is not in contradiction of the terms of the contract, and, farther, must be presumed to be known to and relied upon by both parties.

“I think here that this condition was reasonable—the time was fixed as being reasonable by architects and builders in consultation—it is not contradictory of the terms of the contract, and looking to the evidence led, in my opinion the presumption is that the parties knew the condition and relied upon it. Certainly the defenders relied and acted upon the condition, and if pursuers, or rather their architect, did not they were themselves to blame.”

what is a reasonable interval between an offer and acceptance. The basis, and, so to speak, the text of the evidence in support of the contention that an offer must be accepted within seven days, otherwise the offerer is free, is the printed conditions of tendering agreed to by the architects in Aberdeen and the associations connected with the building trade. The rule on the subject, No. 7, is explicit. The conditions were recently revised in 1890, and this rule was retained, and the decided preponderance of the evidence confirms the presumption that that rule does express the usage of trade in Aberdeen. An effort was made to shew that rules 8 and 9 were less strictly observed, which was partially successful. But these rules refer to matters of detail. Rule 7 must be weighed as evidence of a usage when supported by other evidence, not as binding on the Court in itself, and as evidence its importance is not diminished by the observations on rules 8 and 9. The pursuers, however, further contended that assuming the rule referred to to be binding on the parties who could reasonably be held to have subscribed to it, it was not binding on them. Now, in the first place, the defenders made their offer to Messrs M’Millan, the architects, when no question had arisen, and they were anxious to obtain the contract. I think in the circumstances they were entitled to address themselves to Messrs M’Millan, and could hardly have done otherwise, and that in doing so they were entitled to rely on the usage of trade as embodied in rule 7 being a condition understood on both sides. But, secondly, assuming that the offer was really made to Mrs Murray, and that the rule was not binding upon her, the question arises whether she was not bound to accept within a reasonable time. To decide what was a reasonable time, there can be no evidence better, or so good, as the usage of trade as fixed by rule 7, and I see no reason in law or otherwise for regarding it as too short.”

these conditions, and that they were entitled to assume that the conditions were also in the knowledge of the pursuer or her architects, to whom the offer was sent in. The Sheriff holds, also, that the pursuer was bound to accept within a reasonable time, and that on the question what was a reasonable time, there can be no evidence better, or so good, as the usage of trade as fixed by the conditions. I desire, in passing, to observe that while I do not agree in the conclusion arrived at, the opinions of both the learned Sheriffs shew that care and ability have been applied to the decision of the question at issue; and it is only after full argument that I differ, and I do so on a view of the case which does not seem to have been considered by them.

No. 166.
June 18, 1897.
Murray v.
Rennie &
Angus.

The Sheriff has justly remarked that "the basis, and, so to speak, the text of the evidence in support of the contention that an offer must be accepted within seven days, otherwise the offerer is free, is the printed conditions of tendering agreed to by the architects in Aberdeen and the associations connected with the building trade." It is the 7th of these conditions which is said to govern the present case. Now, on the construction of the "conditions," two remarks occur,—one relating to the conditions as a whole and the other relating to the 7th. (1) The conditions do not purport to be, and do not read as if they were intended to be, statements of practice or implied conditions of contracts. Taken as a whole, they are rather rules or maxims for the guidance of architects—statements of what is best to be done in the matters treated of. (2) When the 7th condition is examined it will be found to be wholly inapplicable to the case before us. It postulates a "date of lodging estimates," that is to say, that a date has been fixed and announced as the last day for offers; and then it says that from that date seven days are to run. It therefore assumes that by a certain day all offers must be in, and that accordingly the architect is from that day in a position to consider and compare the offers and make up his mind. The rule has on the face of it no application or applicability to the case where no day is announced for receiving tenders. It gives one and the same period for all offers; it makes that period run, not from the date of each offer, but from the date when, as announced, the architect will take no more offers, but will begin finally to consider his decision.

Now, in the present case, no such date was announced at all. The pursuer was not committed to any date as that at which the time for offering was over. The pursuer, even on the theory of the rule, was entitled to have had offers all in before she began to consider them; she was entitled to assume that they would not come in simultaneously, and, in fact, they came dropping in for several days. To be consistent with the principle of the rule, the defenders ought, in the absence of a stated last day for offers, by way of analogy, to run the seven days from the day on which the last offer in fact came in. But their theory, and the theory of the Sheriffs, is that the seven days run from the offer itself, and that must mean that a separate period of seven days runs for each offer from its own date. For this I can find no warrant whatever in the "conditions," which, as the Sheriff has said, form the basis of the evidence.

The next point to be observed is that the same considerations which shew that the 7th condition does not apply, shew also that it furnishes no evi

No. 166.
 June 18, 1897.
 Murray v.
 Rennie &
 Angus.

dence at all that the time taken in the present case was unduly or unreasonably long, supposing that to have been the true question for decision. Any bearing which it has is in the other direction. If a punctual architect takes seven days to consider the tenders after they are all in, four days does not seem a very long time to allow for tenders coming in, even supposing (without warrant from the evidence) that the pursuer was committed to simultaneous delivery of the schedules to expected offerers.

Apart from the conditions there is nothing in the evidence to shew that there was any undue or unreasonable delay ; the testimony of the pursuer's husband is that he applied his mind to the offers as soon as he possibly could, and there is no suggestion that he was hindered from doing so by external circumstances.

My opinion, as indicated in these last observations, is that, as matter of fact, it is not proved that there was undue or unreasonable delay in accepting the offer. I must not, however, be understood as asserting that this is the true question in the case. Mr Bell, in his Commentaries (i. 343), has laid it down that " where an offer is made simply, the general rule at common law is that it may be accepted at any time till withdrawn." He goes on to say that " the necessary rapidity of mercantile transaction has introduced an exception in the case of commodities offered to sale, or of an offer to purchase commodities in the ordinary course of trade. For any dealer must know that commodities offered are lying in wait for a market ; that the price is subject to fluctuation ; and that opportunities for disposing of such goods may open and be lost by delay ; or that the person who makes an offer may lose by delay some other opportunity of procuring them. Unreasonable delay in the answer being therefore inconsistent with the spirit of trade, it is an implied condition of a mercantile offer to sell or to purchase that it ought to be instantly accepted, or at least without any undue delay."

Now, it is, to say the least, doubtful whether an offer to build a house falls within the exception stated by Mr Bell, or within the principle of the exception as explained by him ; and if it does not, then what he calls the general rule at common law would seem to apply. The question, in the latter view, would thus be, not whether there had been undue delay in accepting the offer, but whether the offer had been withdrawn. But I mention this view of the case for the purpose of saying that it was not presented to us by the appellant ; and the case was argued on the assumption (presumably based on more recent though uncited authorities) that the true question was, Had there been undue delay ? Holding the opinion which I do as to the failure of the defenders' case, I do not require to consider to what extent Mr Bell's doctrine is a complete statement of the law, or which part of it applies to a builder's offer, and this will be entirely open for future consideration. Only, if I were a building contractor, I should, in the meantime, think it prudent to state in each offer the period for which it is to be binding.

It may be well to add that, as the view which I take of the true construction of the conditions brings down with a run all the evidence based upon them, I have no occasion to consider whether there is here any evidence of usage of trade in the proper sense of the term, or how far the sort of evidence which we have here could avail to establish, as an implied term of this offer, a limitation of its subsistence. No. 166.

I am for recalling the interlocutors appealed against, and finding, in fact, that the offer was accepted and had not been withdrawn before acceptance, and that it was accepted without unreasonable delay, and, in law, that it was binding. As the pursuer's claim is necessarily for damages, we have to consider how much is proved; and I am unable to find evidence of more loss than the difference between the two contracts. For that sum, which I believe is £11, 10s., the pursuer is entitled to decree.

June 18, 1897.
Murray v.
Rennie &
Angus.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff, and found in fact “(1) that the defenders' offer, dated 10th June 1896, was accepted by the pursuer Mrs Murray, on 21st June 1896; (2) that the said offer had not been in the meantime withdrawn; (3) that the offer was accepted without undue or unreasonable delay; (4) that the defenders failed to do the work specified in the offer; (5) that the pursuers have sustained damage to the amount of £11, 10s.: Find in law that the offer was binding when accepted, and that the defenders are liable for the damage sustained by the pursuers: Therefore decern against the defenders for the said sum of £11, 10s.: Find the defenders liable in expenses in both Courts,” &c.

RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—PHILIP, LAING, & HARLEY, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM DANIEL MACGREGOR, Petitioner (Appellant).—Cooper— No. 167.
Munro.

THE MAGISTRATES OF THE BURGH OF LEITH, Respondents.—Balfour— June 18, 1897.
Salvesen. Macgregor v.
Magistrates of Leith.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Alteration of existing building—Provision for light and ventilation—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), sec. 167.—Under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, the Dean of Guild Court of a burgh were entitled to refuse a warrant “for the erection of any new house or building, or for the alteration of the structure of any existing house or building, until satisfied that the plans provide suitably for stability, light, ventilation, and other sanitary requirements thereof.”

Where the plans for the alteration of a building shewed that the alteration would have the effect of improving the light and ventilation of the premises, held that the Dean of Guild Court were not entitled to refuse a warrant on the ground that they were not satisfied that the plans provided suitably for light and ventilation of the building.

WILLIAM DANIEL MACGREGOR, proprietor of tenements, consisting of houses and a boarding-house, on the south side of the court at 112 Kirkgate, Leith, applied to the Magistrates of Leith in their Dean of Guild jurisdiction for warrant to improve the lighting, ventilation, and sanitary arrangements of the premises, by enlarging windows, taking down partitions, erecting new stairs, removing part of wall, and inserting iron beam in same, and executing other minor alterations.*

1ST DIVISION.
Dean of Guild
Court at Leith.

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), sec.

No. 167. The application was served on the Master of Works, who reported that the alterations might improve in a slight degree the light of the respective rooms, but that no alterations, short of entire reconstruction, could ever make the premises thoroughly healthful and suitable for the housing of the working-classes.

June 18, 1897.
Macgregor v.
Magistrates of Leith.

A remit was subsequently made to the medical officer of health and the sanitary inspector for the burgh to say whether, in their opinion, the plans provided suitably for light and ventilation.

They reported that the alterations shewed a slight improvement in the means of lighting the premises, but that more than half the boarding-house was closely surrounded by buildings, and the sunlight was almost entirely shut out on the south; that the alterations might increase the number of lodgers, and that, in their opinion, the plans did not provide suitably for light and ventilation.

On 6th May 1897 the Magistrates, "having visited the premises, and heard the petitioner's agent," found that the plans did not provide suitably for light and ventilation, in terms of clause 167 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and therefore declined to grant the warrant craved.

The petitioner appealed, and argued;—Section 167 of the Burgh Police Act was to be reasonably construed, and "suitably" meant suitably looking to the locality and class of property. The petition was for warrant to improve the existing house, and it was not suggested that the ventilation of the house could be provided for in a better way than by the proposed alterations, except by the removal of buildings, which the Dean of Guild had no power to order. The proposed alterations being admittedly an improvement, the Magistrates had no right to refuse the warrant.

Argued for the Magistrates of Leith;—The Magistrates had not exceeded their jurisdiction. They were entitled under section 167 to refuse a warrant for the alteration of a house, if not satisfied that the house as altered would be suitably lighted and ventilated. The proposed alterations would make the house more attractive, and was an alteration of the mode of occupation¹ which would probably lead to an increase in the number of lodgers. That was a legitimate reason for the Magistrates' refusal to grant the warrant craved.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, no one is entitled to alter the structure of an existing house in the burgh without a warrant of the Commissioners. Anyone who proposes to alter the structure of a house has to present a petition to the Commissioners for warrant to do so, and the petition must set forth a description of the alteration, with such relative plans as are necessary to shew the height and mode of structure and arrangement of the intended alteration.

166 provides for the presentation of a petition for warrant to erect new buildings for human habitation, or for the alteration of existing buildings. Sec. 167 enacts,—“The clerk of the Commissioners shall, at their first meeting after receiving such petition, give notice thereof to the Commissioners, who may decline to grant warrant for the erection of any new house or building, or for the alteration of the structure of any existing house or building, until satisfied that the plans provide suitably for stability, light, ventilation, and other sanitary requirements thereof.”

¹ Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sections 166 and 169.

The present appellant proposed to alter the structure of his existing No. 167. house, and he accordingly petitioned the Magistrates of Leith, who are the Commissioners of that burgh, for warrant to do so, describing the proposed alteration, and lodging plans in accordance with the statute. The Magistrates have declined to grant the warrant craved, on the ground that they are not satisfied that the plans provide suitably for light and ventilation.

June 18, 1897.
Macgregor v.
Magistrates of Leith.

From the proceedings, however, it appears, and in debate it was admitted, that the objection of the Magistrates is not to the alteration, which alone required their sanction, but to the light and ventilation of the house as it exists, and as it will be after the alteration. It is admitted that the alteration, so far as it affects the light and ventilation of the house, improves them. This being so, it seems to me that the Magistrates were bound to grant the warrant. As this was a lawfully existing house, the question before the Court was the merits of the alteration, and not the merits of the house apart from that alteration. I have called this a lawfully existing house, because de facto it existed unchallenged. If its defects in the matters of light and ventilation had exposed it to any hostile action on the part of the Magistrates, it is to be presumed that such action would have been taken. What has been done is to take advantage of the appellant's application to improve his house in order to condemn the house, and this is, in my judgment, a misapplication of section 167.

I am for recalling the interlocutor, and remitting to the Magistrates to grant the warrant craved.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor, and remitted to the Magistrates to grant the warrant craved.

ROBERT D. KER, W.S.—IRONS, ROBERTS, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

MRS MARY HOOD, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Gunn.
CHARLES HOOD, Defender.

No. 168.

June 24, 1897.
Hood v. Hood.

Jurisdiction—Domicile—Husband and Wife—Separation.—In an action of separation and aliment, and for custody and aliment of two children, brought by a wife residing in Scotland against her husband residing in England, the defender deponed that he was 34 years of age, and was born in Scotland, where he served his apprenticeship as an engineer, and that for the last 11 years he had been working in various places in England. He further deponed,—“If I got as good a wage in Scotland as I have been getting in England, I do not doubt but I would go there to work. I only want a living wage. . . . I would go back to Scotland to work if I got a good job. I would not expect to get the same money as I have, but if I got something steady I would be quite willing to go.”

Held (diss. Lord Young, rev. judgment of Lord Pearson) that the defender had never lost his Scottish domicile, and that the Court had jurisdiction.

MRS MARY HOOD, 182 East High Street, Forfar, wife of Charles Hood, engineer, raised this action of separation and aliment against her husband, whom she described as “presently residing at No. 48 Shore Road, Deptford.” She concluded also for the custody of John Hood and Isabella Smart Hood, the children of the marriage, and for

2D DIVISION.
Lord Pearson.

No. 168. aliment for each of them so long as they should be unable to earn a livelihood, and should remain in her custody.

June 24, 1897.
Hood v. Hood.

The Lord Ordinary (Pearson) allowed a proof, at which the defender appeared for himself, although he had not lodged defences.

The following facts were established:—

The defender was born at Inverkeillor, Forfarshire, in 1863, and served his apprenticeship as engineer in Forfar. As a journeyman he worked for a few months in Dundee and Arbroath, and in 1886 went to England where he remained for the next 11 years in the employment of various firms. On 27th December 1889 he was married to the pursuer in Forfar, and after a few days residence in Scotland the parties went to Newcastle, where the defender was then employed. They lived there for eleven months, and then went to London for two months. They removed to Portsmouth, where they lived seven months. In September 1891 they returned to London, and after ten months' residence there they went to Newcastle. In 1893 they returned to London, and lived in various districts until April 1896, when the pursuer left the defender on account of his cruelty to her and returned to her parents in Forfar. The children were born respectively on 1st December 1890, and 18th September 1894, at the house of the pursuer's parents in Forfar.*

On 23d March 1897 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender is domiciled in England, and in respect of no jurisdiction, dismisses the action, and decerns."†

* The defender deponed,— . . . I was born in Inverkeillor. My father died some ten years ago in Forfar, and was buried there. My mother is still living in Forfar. I have three sisters living with my mother. I was working in Arbroath for a short time when I was in Scotland, looking after the case in the Sheriff Court. If I got as good a wage in Scotland as I have been getting in England I do not doubt but I would go there to work. I only want a living wage.

"By the Court.— . . . I would go back to Scotland to work if I got a good job. I would not expect to get the same money as I have, but if I got something steady I would be quite willing to go."

† "OPINION.—A general proof has been led in this case, and if the merits were now to be decided I should have no doubt that the pursuer was entitled to decrea. Her witnesses seem to me entirely straightforward and reliable, with no tendency to exaggeration, and I cannot regard the defender's evidence as of any weight against them.

"But the question of domicile and of jurisdiction is important, and upon the authorities it is narrow enough.

"The pursuer contended that upon the proof the defender's domicile of origin persists; and that, although he has long resided in England, the character of his residence there is such as to preclude the idea that he has acquired an English domicile,—the cases referred to being Patience, 1885, 29 Chancery Div. 976; Steel, 1888, 15 R. 896; Low, 1891, 19 R. 115; Dombrowitzki, 1895, 22 R. 906. The law is clear enough. Upon the facts, the first two cases come nearer to the present than the others. But in the case of Steel the alleged Burmese domicile was repudiated by the Court in language (see p. 909—'Nobody goes to Burmah to remain') not universally applicable to Scotsmen who go to England; while the alleged English domicile was regarded as incidental to the Burmese business, and as 'not affecting his position as a domiciled Scotchman any more than the establishment of a branch in Burmah.' In the case of Colonel Patience, a domiciled Scotsman, he had served in the army in foreign parts for fifty years, after which he retired, and lived a bachelor life for twenty-two years in

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that the Court had no jurisdiction. The case started with the fact that the defender's domicile of origin was Scotland, and the onus was on him to shew that he had lost it. That onus had not been discharged. It was apparent from the proof that he had no intention of giving up his Scots domicile. His residence in England was a mere accident of his employment. He had never really settled there, and he was still willing to live in Scotland. It was a mere question of wages.¹

No. 168.

June 24, 1897.
Hood v. Hood.

No appearance was made for the defender.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the cases decided and cited to us my opinion is that the Court has jurisdiction. According to the evidence there has never been any intention on the part of the defender to give up his original Scottish domicile. He never seems to have settled in any place at all. He was and is a jobbing engineer, moving from town to town wherever he can get a job. He himself says that he would return to Scotland if he could get as good wages for his work. My opinion is that he has never lost his Scottish domicile.

LORD YOUNG.—I regard this as a very important case, all the more important that it is quite new. There is no precedent for an action of separation and aliment brought by a wife against a husband resident in England for years, and who is designed in the summons as residing at Shore Road, Deptford, London. I should have thought it clear that the Courts of England had jurisdiction over any man residing in England who is not there as a visitor, or on the occasion of a jubilee, but is residing there and working for his livelihood. In my opinion it is not material that while in England he has moved about from one town to another. I think that for England in lodgings, hotels, and boarding-houses. The Judge took into account the nature and character of the residence as 'shewing a fluctuating and unsettled mind,' and pronounced for the domicile of origin. The present case differs widely from these in its circumstances. But the pursuer maintains that the principle applies ; that the defender's going to England and staying there was in connection with the prosecution of his trade, and that while so engaged he moved about from place to place in England ; and it is further pointed out that he not only says he would quite willingly return to Scotland if he could get the English rate of wages, but actually wrought at Arbroath for some weeks while he was detained in Scotland in connection with a petition for the custody of his child. After weighing all the circumstances here most carefully, I think it would be going beyond any decided case if I were to hold that the defender had not acquired an English domicile.

"It is indeed the law that the remedies of married persons other than divorce a vinculo are not confined to the Courts of the country of the domicile properly so called. It has recently been laid down by high authority (in Le Mesurier, 1895, Law Rep. App. Cases, 517) that 'the Courts of the residence are warranted in giving the remedy of judicial separation without reference to the domicile of the parties' (per Lord Watson, pages 526-7 and page 531). But that principle has no application in the circumstances of this case, although (assuming a Scottish domicile) it might have supported an application by the wife to an English Court for the remedy of separation and aliment.

"In the circumstances I make no order as to expenses."

¹ Steel v. Steel, July 13, 1888, 15 R. 908, per Lord President Inglis.

No. 168. all purposes relating to his conduct, whether to his wife or to his children, or in the management of his affairs, the English Courts, and the English Courts only, have jurisdiction. That, I think, is clear upon principle, and if there is any decision to the contrary, one would gladly have heard it, but admittedly there is none. The conclusions of the action are based on alleged cruelty to the wife in England. Decree is asked against his keeping his son with him in England, and ordering him to pay the pursuer money periodically. I should have thought it clear, upon principle and authority, that while the English Courts have jurisdiction, this Court has none. It is admitted that this Court would have no jurisdiction over such a defender in questions of debt, whether ordinary debt or damages for misconduct. What is the distinction here? The defender is said to have misconducted himself to his wife in England so as to subject him to be deprived of her society, and ordered to make payment of money to her periodically. It is said that he was born in Scotland. The domicile of origin may have a great deal to do with a question of succession, but has nothing to do with an action of damages for misconduct similar to the present. I should have thought that a case of this kind, admittedly new and unique, was too serious and important to be determined by a majority of the Court, but might very well have merited further consideration, and possibly a reference to a larger Court than the present. In my opinion the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD TRAYNER.—I do not consider what decree the pursuer may be entitled to under the conclusions of the summons and the proof which she has led, because the only question at present for us to decide is whether the pursuer is entitled to convene the defender before us. The sole question is, whether the defender is subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts. Upon that question I entertain no doubt. I think the defender is subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts. The defender is a Scotsman by origin, and has never lost his Scottish domicile. He has never acquired, or shewn any intention of acquiring, an English domicile. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is wrong.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with the majority of your Lordships.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remitted to him to dispose of the cause.

JOHN MACKAY, S.S.C.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 169.
June 26, 1897.
Dessau v.
Daish.

MORLAND NICHOLL DESSAU, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Clyde.
ROBERT EVERS DAISH, Defender (Respondent).—Crabb Watt.

Process—Mandatory—Foreigner resident in England—Impecuniosity—Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 54).—Held (rev. judgment of Lord Pearson) that an American pursuer, who was resident in England and had no immediate intention of leaving that country, was not bound to sist a mandatory, in respect that the decree of the Scots Court for expenses could be enforced against him in England under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.

Lawson's Trustees v. British Linen Co., June 20, 1874, 1 R. 1065, followed.

Mere impecuniosity is not a sufficient ground for ordaining a party to sist a mandatary. No. 169.

THIS was an action at the instance of Morland Nicholl Dessau, designed in the summons as "sometime of No. 32 Hawlay Street, Boston, United States of America, and at present residing at No. 45 Weymouth Street, Portland Place, London," against Robert Evers Daish, merchant in Edinburgh. The pursuer concluded, inter alia, for declarator that the defender had no right to print or sell the calendar known as Dessau's Calendar, except on the conditions specified in an agreement between them, that he had not fulfilled these conditions, and that the pursuer was thus entitled to print and sell the calendar, and for damages.

June 26, 1897.
Dessau v.
Daish.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Pearson.

The defender, in his answers, stated "that the pursuer is a citizen of the United States of America, and is residing in England for temporary purposes. He has no domicile in this country or in England."

He further founded upon correspondence between him and the pursuer, with the view of shewing that the pursuer was in straits for money, and pressed by creditors.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer ought, ante omnia, to be ordained to sist a mandatary.

Counsel for the pursuer explained at the bar that his client had left the house in Weymouth Street which he occupied at the date when the action was raised, was now in occupation of a house at Ealing under a lease from year to year (September to September), and that he had no immediate intention of leaving England.

On 29th May 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) appointed the pursuer to sist a mandatary within fourteen days.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action upon a minute of agreement, dated in 1894, in which the pursuer is designed as 'of 32 Hawlay Street, Boston, United States of America, manufacturer.' In the summons, which was raised in December 1895, he describes himself as 'sometime of 32 Hawlay Street, Boston, United States of America, manufacturer, and at present residing at No. 45 Weymouth Street, Portland Place, London,' and he explains in the condescendence that he is lessee of that house at a rent of £235, under a lease which has seventeen and a-half years to run. It was, however, explained at the bar that he has given up that lease, and is residing at Ealing, near London, in a house which he has from year to year. The defender avers that the pursuer is a citizen of the United States, and that he is residing in England for temporary purposes; and, as I read the pursuer's qualified denial at the end of condescendence 1, it does not extend to a denial of these averments. On these statements, and on the further ground that the pursuer's letters produced shew him to have been pressed for money and apprehensive of diligence, the defender moves that he should be ordained to sist a mandatary. I do not proceed on the latter ground. But I hold that the pursuer, being alleged to be domiciled in the United States, and having failed to shew that his residence in England is such as to bring him within the rule laid down in the case of Lawson's Trustees (1 R. 1065), ought to sist a mandatary as a condition of being allowed to proceed.

"The only difficulty I have felt in arriving at this conclusion arises from the action being one in which a foreigner is seeking implement of a contract made with a Scotsman, and damages for alleged breach of that contract. But I do not find that this consideration has ever been recognised as a reason for not applying the rule.

"I shall therefore allow the pursuer a reasonable time within which to

No. 169. The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The question whether a party should be ordained to sist a mandatary was one for the discretion of the Court, and was a question not of domicile but of residence. The principle of the rule that a party resident abroad required to sist a mandatary was twofold,—first, that there might be someone within the country answerable to the other party for expenses; and second, that there might be someone answerable to the Court for the proper conduct of the case.¹ In general the first was the material consideration, there being no case in which the second had been held a sufficient ground by itself for requiring a mandatary to be sisted. The effect of the Judgments Extension Act of 1868² was to make residence in England as good in the matter of security for costs as residence in Scotland, and therefore a person resident in England would not be required to sist a mandatary, unless there were some special reasons for requiring him to do so. No such reasons existed in the present case.³

June 26, 1897.
Dessau v.
Daish.

Argued for the defender ;—Prior to the passing of the Judgments Extension Act, the rule was that all foreigners, without distinction as to their place of residence, required to sist a mandatary.⁴ This rule was not touched by the decision in Lawson's Trustees,⁵ or the later case of D'Ernesti.⁶ In *Lawson's Trustees*³ the pursuers were Englishmen. They were also of undoubted solvency. In all the cases the question had been treated as a question of circumstances, and here the fact, appearing from the letters, that the pursuer was in great pecuniary straits, was a ground for requiring him to sist a mandatary. It was also to be taken into account that he was only resident in England for temporary purposes, and that the lease of the house he occupied expired in September.

LORD ADAM.—This is a reclaiming note against a judgment of the Lord Ordinary appointing the pursuer to sist a mandatary. The action is by a Mr Dessau, who is designed in the summons as “sometime of No. 32 Hawley Street, Boston, United States of America, manufacturer, and at present residing at No. 45 Weymouth Street, Portland Place, London,” and the ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded is that “the pursuer, being alleged to be domiciled in the United States, and having failed to shew that his residence in England is such as to bring him within the rule laid down in the case of Lawson's Trustees,³ ought to sist a mandatary as a condition of being allowed to proceed.” It appears, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary has not proceeded on the alleged impecuniosity of the pursuer, but upon the fact that he is a foreigner only temporarily resident in the United Kingdom.

It appears to me that the question whether a pursuer should be appointed to sist a mandatary is now, as it has always been, a matter in the discretion sist a mandatary ; and on this being done, I shall proceed to dispose of the other preliminary questions which were argued.”

¹ Simla Bank v. Home, May 21, 1870, 8 Macph. 781, per Lord Kinloch, at p. 782 ; Lawson's Trustees v. British Linen Co., June 20, 1874, 1 R. 1065, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 1066.

² 31 and 32 Vict. c. 54.

³ Lawson's Trustees v. British Linen Co., June 20, 1874, 1 R. 1065.

⁴ Ersk. iii. 3, 33, note 140 ; Shand's Practice, 154.

⁵ D'Ernesti v. D'Ernesti, Feb. 11, 1882, 9 R. 655.

of the Court, but in the exercise of our discretion we have rules and decisions to guide us, and one of these decisions is the case of Lawson's Trustees,¹ which is referred to by the Lord Ordinary, and was the case most discussed in debate. Prior to the Judgments Extension Act and the case of *Lawson's Trustees*¹ the general rule was—there may perhaps have been some exceptions, but I do not remember any—that every foreigner was bound to sist a mandatory, but then it is to be borne in mind that prior to the Judgments Extension Act “foreigner” meant any person not domiciled in Scotland, and included Englishmen or Irishmen just as much as a citizen of the United States or other foreign country. At least I do not remember that, prior to the Act in question, any distinction was taken between an Englishman and a foreigner. But the effect of the Judgments Extension Act, as explained in the case of Lawson's Trustees,¹ was to make a material difference between them, because it was then decided that, although a pursuer was resident in England, he was not on that account alone bound to sist a mandatory, the reason being that the Judgments Extension Act made a decree for expenses pronounced by the Scots Court as enforceable in England and Ireland as in Scotland, and so made it immaterial whether the pursuer was resident in England, Ireland, or Scotland. I do not see that there is any ground for the distinction sought to be taken between an Englishman and a foreigner resident in England, both being subject to the decree of the English Court, and therefore of the Scots Court, under the Judgments Extension Act.

No. 169.

June 26, 1897,
Dessau v.
Daish.

There were two other grounds upon which the defender maintained that the pursuer should be required to sist a mandatory, (1) that he was only resident in the United Kingdom for a temporary purpose, and (2) that he was alleged to be in a state of impecuniosity.

With regard to the first of these grounds, the facts, as explained at the bar, are, that he is residing in England without any present intention of leaving it. But if he is resident in the United Kingdom with no immediate intention of leaving, we cannot inquire as to the probable duration of his residence. If the defender finds reason to believe, in the course of the proceedings, that the pursuer has quitted the jurisdiction, then he may apply to have him ordained to sist a mandatory, but the mere fact that his residence is temporary and not permanent is not a sufficient reason for pronouncing such an order.

As to the pursuer's alleged impecuniosity, the letters read to us, which are not of very recent date, certainly do shew him to be in an impecunious state, but I never understood that mere poverty was a sufficient ground for shutting the door of the Court to a litigant.

On the whole I am of opinion that the pursuer is not bound hoc statu to sist a mandatory, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled.

LORD M'LAREN.—There is no doubt as to the rule of the common law on this subject. The practice was that whenever a pursuer was extraneous—I had rather not use the word “foreigner” as applicable to our fellow-subjects in England and the Colonies—to the jurisdiction of the Court, he was

¹ 1 R. 1065.

No. 169. under the necessity of sisting a mandatary. There are other reasons suggested which may have accounted for the origin of the rule, but in its application in our time I think the matter of being responsible for expenses was the main and determining consideration in all such cases. It was not an absolute rule. The Court always maintained its right to exercise a discretion, and in some cases the necessity for finding a mandatary was dispensed with. Some years after the passing of the Judgments Extension Act, the Court,¹ recognising that the appointment of a mandatary was a matter of discretion, thought fit to alter its practice by laying down explicitly that persons resident in England and Ireland should be treated in all such questions substantially as if they were resident in Scotland: that is to say, that the party was not to find a mandatary unless under circumstances which would justify an application against a Scotchman to find security for expenses. That judgment has been understood to fix the practice, and has been constantly acted upon.

June 26, 1897.
Dessau v.
Daish.

Now, it seems to me that in developing this equitable principle the Court did not proceed upon the view that a party resident in England or Ireland was to be favoured because of his nationality. If that had been the ground of judgment, the principle would have been extended to India and the Colonies. The decision proceeded upon the purely practical consideration that under the Judgments Extension Act decree could be enforced for expenses, and therefore that as against the party resident in England or Ireland the other party was in as good a position with reference to his power of making a judgment effectual as if his opponent had been resident within the jurisdiction of the Court. That is the ground of judgment expressed in the Lord President's opinion. It is the logical and the only ground that the Court could proceed upon, if they were extending the operation of the Judgments Extension Act, and that ground of judgment plainly covers the case of a foreigner domiciled abroad but resident in London. It could not have been the intention of the Court in laying down this rule to make it necessary to try the question of domicile in order to the application of the rule. Therefore, I am of opinion that Mr Dessau, though neither naturalised nor said to be domiciled in England, is still in the position of a person resident in England, and therefore is not, under ordinary circumstances, to be required to sist a mandatary.

I agree also with what your Lordship in the chair has said on the second ground. The Lord Ordinary has not proceeded upon the ground of poverty, and I agree that poverty is no reason for compelling a person to sist a mandatary. While the Court may not have strictly defined a rule, the usual case of requiring a person to find security for expenses is where he is either bankrupt or has granted a trust-disposition for behoof of creditors, so as to take the administration of his fortune—be it great or small—out of his own hands.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The defender's counsel says that it is the rule that a foreigner requires to sist a mandatary. I am not aware that the rule ever obtained that a foreigner, irrespective of his residence, could not sue without a mandatary. The rule was that a pursuer resident abroad required to sist a mandatary, but in applying that rule, which was always a matter for the discretion of the Court, it was never suggested that the Court should inquire into the place of the pursuer's birth, domicile, or allegiance. The only question was as to his residence, and, if it appeared that he was resident abroad, it did not matter whether he was a Scotsman, or an Englishman, or a subject of some other country. The one condition which was indispensable to the operation of the rule was that he should not be resident in Scotland. The rule has been modified in consequence of the Judgments Extension Act, because the decrees of this Court may now be enforced in other parts of the United Kingdom; and for the purpose of this question residence in some other part of the United Kingdom is thus practically equivalent to residence in Scotland.

¹ See Lawson's Trustees v. British Linen Co., 1 R. 1065.

No. 169.
June 26, 1897.
Dessau v.
Daish.

With regard to the pursuer's alleged impecuniosity, I confess I am not inclined to draw any inference from the letters. All that they shew is that the pursuer was pressing the defender for money on the ground apparently that he had some claim against him. That may or may not be the case, but it appears to me that demands of that kind, and the urgency with which they are pressed, afford no safe ground for any conclusion as to the pecuniary condition of a letter writer who has not been examined as a witness, or given an opportunity of explaining the circumstances in which his letters were written. If it were safe to draw any such conclusion I agree that mere impecuniosity is no reason whatever for requiring a party to find security for expenses or to sist a mandatory.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—JAMES GIBSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

PETER MACKINNON AND OTHERS (Sir William Mackinnon's Trustees), No. 170.

First Parties.—C. J. Guthrie—C. K. Mackenzie.

MRS MACNEILL (MacNeill's Administratrix), Second Party.—

Johnston—W. C. Smith.

MRS MACNEILL, Third Party.—Johnston—W. C. Smith.

ANDREW DUNCAN MACNEILL, Fourth Party.—Johnston—W. C. Smith.

ALMA LOUISA MACNEILL AND OTHERS, Fifth Parties.—

C. J. Guthrie—C. K. Mackenzie.

June 29, 1897.
Mackinnon's
Trustees v.
MacNeill.

Succession—Vesting—Direction to pay on attainment of majority.—A testator directed his trustees to make payment to his nephew, D. M., of a legacy of £60,000, "and that in liferent for his liferent use only, and on his death I direct the said sum of £60,000 to be paid to and among his children equally among them, share and share alike, on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one, payable as such children, after their father's death, respectively attain majority, the interest or annual produce being, however, in the meantime, available for their maintenance and education, the issue of any of the said children who may have predeceased taking their parent's share."

D. M. predeceased the testator.

Held that the fee of the £60,000 vested equally in all D. M.'s children at the testator's death, irrespective of their attainment of majority.

Adam's Trustees v. Carrick, 23 R. 828, distinguished.

No. 170. Process—Special Case—Questions not argued.—The Court will not answer questions in a special case which are not argued.

June 29, 1897.
Mackinnon's
Trustees v.
MacNeill.

1ST DIVISION.

SIR WILLIAM MACKINNON died on 22d June 1893, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he disposed and assigned his whole estate to trustees.

The tenth purpose of the settlement was in the following terms:—
“I direct and appoint my said trustees to make payment to my nephew, the said Duncan MacNeill, of another sum of £60,000, and that in liferent for his liferent use only, and on his death I direct the said sum of £60,000 to be paid to and among his children, equally among them, share and share alike, on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one, payable as such children, after their father's death, respectively attain majority, the interest or annual produce being, however, in the meantime, available for their maintenance and education, the issue of any of the said children who may have predeceased taking the parent's share.”

The testator made a number of other bequests to different nephews and nieces and grandnephews and grandnieces in liferent, and to their issue in fee. In regard to some of these legacies he provided that if the liferenters should die without issue the sums bequeathed should revert to his trustees, and form part of his trust-estate.

Duncan MacNeill predeceased the testator. He was survived by a widow and seven children. One of the children, Janet Mackinnon MacNeill, died on 1st October 1894, aged six years.

After Janet's death a question arose as to whether a share in the legacy of £60,000 had vested in her, and a special case was presented by (1) Sir William Mackinnon's trustees; (2) Mrs MacNeill, mother of Janet MacNeill, as administratrix of Janet's moveable estate, under letters of administration from the High Court of Justice in England; (3) Mrs MacNeill, as an individual*; (4) Andrew Duncan MacNeill, Janet's eldest brother, as representing her in heritage; and (5) the other children of Duncan MacNeill.

The opinion of the Court was craved on the following question:—
“(1) Whether one seventh share of the said legacy of £60,000 had vested in the said Janet Mackinnon MacNeill at the date of her death?”

A question was also put to the Court as to whether one-seventh of a share of the residue of Sir William Mackinnon's estate destined to Duncan MacNeill and his issue had vested in Janet, but at the discussion counsel for the fifth parties stated that he did not see his way to offer any argument against the vesting of the residue, but that the trustees were desirous of having the question answered by the Court.

Argued for the fifth parties;—There being nothing but a direction to pay to each child upon the occurrence of the uncertain event of the child attaining majority, vesting was postponed in the case of each child until majority.¹ In this case there was a destination over just as much as there was in Adam's Trustees,² the issue of the children being conditionally instituted. In Alves' Trustees v. Grant,² and Waters' Trustees v. Waters,³ there was a direction to hold apart from

* Janet having died domiciled in England, her mother was entitled to one-half of her moveable estate.

¹ Adam's Trustees v. Carrick, June 18, 1896, 23 R. 828.

² Alves' Trustees v. Grant, June 3, 1874, 1 R. 969.

³ Waters' Trustees v. Waters, Dec. 6, 1884, 12 R. 253.

the direction to pay. In *Wilson's Trustees v. Quick*¹ the trustees were empowered to advance the capital of the shares. *Fox*² had been differed from,³ and *Harrison*⁴ could not be accepted as authoritative in Scotland, for vesting was there held to have taken place prior to the period of distribution, although the settlement contained a survivorship clause. A provision that the whole of the interest of a legacy not yet payable should be paid to or applied for the legatee did not necessarily imply vesting.⁵ Here the provision was not so strong, as it consisted merely of a declaration that the income should be available for behoof of the legatees.

No. 170.
June 29, 1897.
Mackinnon's
Trustees v.
MacNeill.

Argued for the second, third, and fourth parties;—There was no survivorship clause or destination over, and the interest was to be applied for the children's benefit prior to majority. The conclusion to be drawn from the terms of the clause was that the condition as to the attainment of majority was not adjoined to the gift, but only to its payment.⁶ The opposite conclusion would involve seven different periods of vesting, and was at variance with the direction as to equal distribution, for that presupposed that the number of legatees would be ascertained before payment fell to be made to the eldest. The view that vesting was not postponed was supported by the fact that in regard to other legacies the testator had provided for the event of the possible failure of the legatees, but here he evidently had not contemplated the possibility of this legacy falling into intestacy.

LORD ADAM.—The only question argued, and therefore the only question which we have to answer, is, whether a share of the legacy of £60,000 was vested in Janet Mackinnon MacNeill at the date of her death. The other questions in the case not having been argued, we can give no opinion upon them. The question argued to us arises on the tenth purpose of the settlement of Sir William Mackinnon. By that purpose Sir William directed his trustees to make payment to his nephew Duncan MacNeill of a "sum of £60,000, and that in liferent for his liferent use only, and on his death" he directed "the said sum of £60,000 to be paid to and among his [Duncan MacNeill's] children, equally among them, share and share alike, on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one, payable as such children, after their father's death, respectively attain majority, the interest or annual produce being in the meantime available for their maintenance and education, the issue of any of the said children who may have predeceased taking the parent's share."

¹ Wilson's Trustees v. Quick, Feb. 28, 1878, 5 R. 697.

² Fox v. Fox, 1875, L. R., 19 Eq. 286.

³ Tucker v. Wintle, L. R. [1896], 2 Ch. 711.

⁴ Harrison v. Grimwood, 1849, 12 Beavan, 192.

⁵ Bogle's Trustees v. Cochrane, Nov. 29, 1892, 20 R. 108, esp. per Lord Justice-Clerk, at p. 111; Adam's Trustees v. Carrick, June 18, 1896, 23 R. 828.

⁶ Alves' Trustees v. Grant, June 3, 1874, 1 R. 969, per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, at p. 972; Waters' Trustees v. Waters, Dec. 6, 1884, 12 R. 253; Wilson's Trustees v. Quick, Feb. 28, 1878, 5 R. 697; Harrison v. Grimwood, 1849, 12 Beavan, 192; Wood v. Burnet's Trustees, 1813, Hume, 271; Kennedy v. Crawford, July 20, 1841, 3 D. 1266; Ralston v. Ralston, July 8, 1842, 4 D. 1496; Fox v. Fox, 1875, L. R., 19 Eq. 286, per M. R. Jessel, at p. 290.

No. 170.

June 29, 1897.
Mackinnon's
Trustees v.
MacNeill.

The facts which give rise to the question are that Duncan MacNeill predeceased the testator leaving a daughter Janet, who survived the testator, but died unmarried before attaining majority, and the parties whose interests are in conflict are Janet's mother, who is entitled, as the child was domiciled in England, to one-half of whatever vested in her, and Janet's brothers and sisters, who claim to take under the settlement on the footing that no share vested in Janet.

In construing the tenth purpose the first thing which occurs to one is that there is clearly no benefit of survivorship given to the children inter se.
/ There is a gift to a class—to those children, not more or less, in existence at the date of vesting, whatever that may be, but there is certainly no survivorship clause. The next material point is, that there is no destination over. No doubt there is a substitution of the issue of any of the children
2 who may have predeceased to their parent's share, but that is not a proper destination over, and has never been so treated, because it merely expresses what the law itself would imply, namely, the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.

Taking the question as one of general intention, I think the testator meant to give the life interest of this sum of £60,000 to his nephew, and the fee to his children at once. I think the words of the clause point in that direction, and I find nothing in the clause inconsistent with that view. It will be observed that, as Mr Johnston pointed out, the direction is, that on the death of the nephew, the life renter, the said sum is to be paid to and among his children, equally among them, share and share alike. Now, if one were to stop there, as was suggested, there could be very little doubt that a bequest in these terms vested a morte, the direction being to pay to the children on the death of the life renter, and there being no destination over. But then we have these words, "on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one"; and the question is, whether we are to read that as merely an administrative direction. It appears to me that it is not a condition of the gift, but a direction as to payment. The direction is repeated in these words, "payable as such children after their father's death respectively attain majority." It was contended that these words have no other meaning than to direct the trustees to pay to the children on their attaining majority, and neither they have, but I think the form of expression in this latter clause goes to support the view that the words do not import a condition of the gift but a mere direction as to when the share is to be payable. The conclusion I arrive at is, therefore, that a share of the legacy vested in Janet a morte testatoris.

The case of *Carrick*¹ was pressed on us as ruling this case, but it appears to me to do nothing of the kind. Of course all these cases have to be considered with reference to the terms of the settlement, which is the subject of construction, and the case of *Carrick*¹ is quite distinct from the present, in respect that, in that case, there was a very clear direction to pay on the youngest of the children attaining the age of twenty-one years. That was, if I remember aright, the only period pointed at in the deed at which payment was to be made. Here the direction is to pay as each of the children respectively attains majority, and that direction, it appears to me, if construed as attaching a condition to the gift, would be quite inconsistent with the other direction in the deed, namely, that each child is to get an equal share of the £60,000. The direction, as I read it, means that each child, when it reaches the period of payment—that is, attains majority—is entitled to get its share and go away with it, and has no further claim on the estate. In my opinion, therefore, the question should be answered in the affirmative.

¹ 23 R. 828.

No. 170.

June 29, 1897.
Mackinnon's
Trustees v.
MacNeill.

LORD M'LAREN.—The only question which your Lordships propose to answer is the question put to the effect of determining whether Miss Janet MacNeill took a vested interest under the tenth purpose of Sir William Mackinnon's will, whereby a legacy of £60,000 is given to be enjoyed in liferent by Mr MacNeill, and to be shared by his family in the manner there pointed out in fee.

The gift is in the form of a direction to trustees, and the direction seems to be qualified by three conditions :—First, that the sum is to be paid after the death of Duncan MacNeill ; second, that it is to be paid only on the respective majorities of each member of his family ; and third, that in case of the death of any child leaving issue payment shall be made to the issue in place of the parent to the extent of that parent's original share. Now as was pointed out by Lord Moncreiff in the case of Alves' Trustees,¹ which has been cited, these questions of conditional vesting generally resolve into this inquiry, whether the conditions only have relation to the time and mode of payment, or whether they are intended to condition the right of the legatee. In the former case the condition is consistent with the existence of a vested right in the person of the legatee, in the latter case of course it is not ; for to say that a gift is affected by a condition is just another way of expressing that no right is given until the condition is purified.

With regard to the first of these conditions—the survivance by the children of their father—it is enough to say that Duncan MacNeill died in the testator's lifetime, and therefore no question arises with reference to the survivance of him. I cannot see that if the father had survived the testator there is anything in the terms of this deed which would make that a material consideration or suggest a different construction. But then Duncan MacNeill did not in fact survive the testator, and therefore it was possible to ascertain the class of his children as at the date of the testator's death—I mean that the class could not be increased by the birth of objects after the testator's death.

Coming to the next condition—the condition of payment at majority—there are cases where a fund is directed to be divided, once for all, when the youngest member of the family shall attain a certain age, and where it may be a reasonable consideration that the class could not be ascertained until that event occurred. But it is a clear point in the construction of the clause before us that the class of objects must be fixed before any part of the fund is paid away, because each child, as he or she attains majority, is to be paid out his share, his aliquot share, of £60,000. Now, this direction to pay the child his share would, in the absence of anything repugnant to the con

No. 170. June 29, 1897.
Mackinnon's
Trustees v.
MacNeill.

dition, imply that, as soon as the eldest child had attained majority, the trustees were in a position to pay, because they must know into how many shares the fund is to be divided. This is to my mind conclusive of the question that the attainment of majority was not intended in this case to be a condition of the gift, because the class being defined and ascertained before the younger children respectively attain majority, it follows that the attainment of majority is not a condition of the gift in their favour.

Then in regard to the condition arising out of the words substituting children to parents, I concur with what your Lordship in the chair has said, that there is a body of decisions of the House of Lords and of this Court to the effect that such words are fully satisfied by the supposition that they were inserted only to prevent a lapse by the death of an object during the testator's lifetime. In that view the words of substitution express nothing more than the condition which we have borrowed from the Roman law si sine liberis decesserit. In any case I should not myself be disposed to hold that a clause in general terms substituting children in place of parents, even in a case in which the conditio si sine liberis would not apply, was to be read as importing a condition or having the effect of postponing vesting.

The result is that the conditions which have been introduced into this very carefully guarded and carefully drawn will appear to me to have reference only to payment, and are not inconsistent with the general intention that the right to the fee of the sum of £60,000 should vest in the class. I am therefore of opinion that the share in question vested in Janet MacNeill.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and agree with your Lordships that this child's interest in her share of the legacy of £60,000 vested at the death of the testator, notwithstanding that she had not attained majority, but died in pupillarity. I have come to that conclusion for the same reasons that your Lordships have already explained, and therefore I shall only add that I think the material considerations are three in number.

In the first place, I think the testator has very clearly directed that the fee of this legacy on the death of the liferenter shall be divided equally among a class of persons, the members of which are to be ascertained at a period which may be long anterior to this particular child's majority, and in point of fact has turned out to be anterior to the period at which she would have attained twenty-one years of age had she lived. I think this is clear from the direction that upon the death of the liferenter—on the father's death—the sum is to be divided among his children, equally among them, share and share alike, and paid to each child on his or her attaining majority. The eldest child who first attains majority is to take an equal share with all the other children of the sum of £60,000, and that must be paid over to him and his claim paid off and discharged on his attaining majority irrespective altogether of the ages of his brothers and sisters. The division therefore must be made at a certain point of time and once for all, although the period of payment of the younger children's shares may not have arrived; and it appears to me to follow that the extent of the interest of each child cannot be dependent upon the arrival of their postponed period of payment. The number of children must be ascertained once for all when the first payment comes to be made, and therefore the vesting cannot be postponed until any later date. No. 170.

The second point which I think material is that there is no gift to survivors of the children themselves; and the third is that there is no destination over, because I entirely agree with what has been said by your Lordships, that a gift to issue, which is really equivalent to the implication of law in favour of children, does not operate as a destination over.

June 29, 1897.
Mackinnon's
Trustees v.
MacNeill.

The result of these three considerations seems to me to be that the testator has clearly directed that this sum of money is to be divided among the members of a certain class who are to be ascertained irrespective of the period of majority of the younger children, and that he has not intended that anybody else shall take any interest in that particular sum. The postponement of payment therefore is, in the first place, necessary merely for the payment of the liferent to their father, and secondly, till the time shall arrive when the child shall attain majority, and be able to take payment of his own money and discharge the trustees. On general considerations, therefore, I should not consider the question one of very great difficulty when once one has come to see what is the precise effect of the direction which the testator has given in reference to payment.

But in addition to these main grounds, Mr Johnston brought forward two other considerations to which I think some weight is to be attached, although he said he used them rather as confirming his argument, as what he called make-weights, than as having very great substance and force in themselves. The first is that although the principal of a child's share is not to be paid over until it attains majority, the interest or annual produce is in the meantime to be available for that child's maintenance and education; and so far as that goes, it is a consideration in favour of the view that the child had already taken a vested interest in the sum, out of the income of which it was to be supported during minority and pupillarity.

The second confirmatory point on which he founded was this, that whereas in the case of many of the other legacies in this will, the testator has taken care to provide that if all the persons whom he has called nominatim to benefit from these legacies shall die without issue, the sum bequeathed shall revert to the trustees and form part of the trust-estate, there is no similar provision as to this particular sum, and the inference Mr Johnston draws—and I think fairly enough—from that is, that the testator did not contemplate the probability of this sum falling into residue at all, but thought he had provided sufficiently for it by leaving it to the children of his nephew Duncan MacNeill who were alive at the time that his will came into operation by his death. Therefore it is said—I think with some force—that he cannot be supposed to have contemplated that there should in any case be intestacy with reference to this particular legacy.

These last two considerations are not, I think, without force; but at the same time I agree with your Lordships that the main ground of judgment ought to be what you have already stated in the opinions, with which I concur.

I agree also that it is quite impossible for us to answer questions which the parties do not choose to argue. It is not the purpose of special cases to obtain an opinion of the Court on questions which are not brought before it in such a way as to enable the Court not only to express an opinion but

No. 170.

June 29, 1897.
Mackinnon's
Trustees v.
MacNeill.

to give a decisive judgment on them. It is said that trustees ought to be advised as to what course they should take in particular circumstances; and that is quite true, provided the questions have arisen in such a way as to give rise to a litigation upon which a judgment inter partes may be given. If that cannot be done—if there is no room for a judgment inter partes—then the opinion of the Court is not binding upon the parties interested, and gives no protection to the trustees. What protects trustees is a judgment and decision of the Court; and we are not in the practice of deciding questions which are not disputed, or which counsel for the respective parties have declined to argue.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and refused to answer the second question.

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S., Agents.

No. 171.

WILLIAM CLARK AND OTHERS (W. Maclean's Trustees), First Parties.

—Craigie.

June 29, 1897.
Maclean's
Trustees v.
Maclean.

OLIVIA RACHEL NORA MACLEAN AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—

W. C. Smith—Constable.

MRS ADA MARRINER ATKINS OR MACLEAN (C. Maclean's Executrix), Third Party.—W. C. Smith—Constable.

WILLIAM CLARK AND OTHERS (C. Maclean's Trustees), Fourth Parties.
—C. K. Mackenzie—Younger.

Succession—Vesting—Power to trustees to postpone division or to make interim divisions—Survivorship.—A testator, after directing his trustees to pay certain alimentary annuities, directed that "after the foregoing purposes are served" his trustees should divide the residue of his estate equally, share and share alike, among his surviving children nominatim, and the children of a deceased daughter, "such children coming in the place of their mother and receiving equally among them the share that would have fallen to her if she had survived me, and formed one of my residuary legatees, and to the survivors of my said five children and grandchildren; declaring that, in the event of any of my children before named, or grandchildren before referred to, dying prior to the division of said residue, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall succeed equally, share and share alike, to that portion of my said means and estate which would have devolved on their parent under the destination above written, and as if such parent had survived said period of division." The testator empowered his trustees to sell all or any portion of his estates at such times as they might consider advantageous, and to set aside sufficient investments for payment of the annuities, if they thought proper. He further empowered them to postpone the division of the residue until the whole had been realised, or to make interim divisions as the realisation proceeded.

Held that the whole residue vested in the children and grandchildren of the testator at the date of his death.

1ST DIVISION.

WILLIAM M'LEAN of Plantation died on 22d February 1867, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees.

After directing his trustees to pay a free liferent annuity of £500 to his widow, a like annuity of £100 to his son Colin, and one of £30 to his sister Agnes, the truster provided as follows:—

"(Lastly) After the foregoing purposes are served, my said trustees shall divide the residue and remainder of my said means and estate No. 171.

 equally, share and share alike, among my remaining children, William M'Lean, Joseph M'Lean, Mary M'Lean or Niven, Charles M'Lean, June 29, 1897. and Rachel M'Lean, and the children of my deceased daughter Jane Maclean's M'Lean or Clark, such children coming in the place of their mother, Trustees v. Maclean.
 and receiving equally among them the share that would have fallen to her if she had survived me, and formed one of my residuary legatees; and to the survivors of my said five children and grandchildren: Declaring that, in the event of any of my children before named, or grandchildren before referred to, dying prior to the division of said residue leaving lawful issue, such issue shall succeed equally, share and share alike, to that portion of my said means and estate which would have devolved on their parent under the destination above written, and as if such parent had survived said period of division. But all such portions of my said means and estate as may become due and payable to any of my grandchildren under the destinations before written shall be retained by my said trustees until said grandchildren attain respectively the age of twenty-one years complete, or are married; and in the meantime they shall invest the same in such securities as they may think proper in their own names, in trust for behoof of said grandchildren, and apply the annual proceeds, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in the maintenance and education of said grandchildren respectively. . . . Declaring also that, in the event of any of my sons who are already married or may yet marry predeceasing me leaving a widow, but without leaving lawful issue, or in the event of such issue, if any, also predeceas-ing me, then, and in either of these events, I provide and declare that the surviving wife or wives of such of my said sons who may so predecease me without leaving lawful issue that shall survive me shall have no right to, nor interest in, any bequest or share or portion of my estate that would have devolved on or fallen to such son or sons so predeceasing, except in so far as such son or sons by marriage-contract, deed of settlement, or will, may have appointed or devised in favour of their said wives: And to enable my said trustees and their foresaids to carry these presents into effect, I authorise and empower them to sell, by private bargain or public roup, all or any portion of my said means and estate before conveyed, and that at such times as they may consider advantageous, and to invest if they think proper, in such securities as they may approve of, sums sufficient for the payment of the annuities before provided, or to purchase said annuities or to allow them to remain burdens on any portion of the heritable property left by me, the said annuities being hereby declared by me to be real liens and burdens on said heritable property until such investiture or purchase; and farther, with power either to postpone the division of the residue of my means and estate until the whole has been realised, or to make interim divisions, one or more, as the realisation proceeds; and in general, to manage and dispose of the means and estate hereby conveyed, as fully, freely, and effectually as I could have done myself before executing these presents. But I recommend to my said trustees, first, to be cautious in selling or feuing any portions of the lands of Plantation for some years after my death, my conviction being that the value of these lands is increasing every year, but at the same time, if an offer which they consider eligible be made for the whole or any portion of said lands, it is not my wish that they should reject or lose sight of such offer, but, on the con-

No. 171. trary, that they should use their own discretion and sound judgment in the circumstances."

June 29, 1897.
Maclean's
Trustees v.
Maclean.

William M'Lean was survived by his widow, his son Colin, his sister Agnes, and by the children and grandchildren named or described in the residuary clause of the settlement. He left moveable estate amounting to £117,838, and he was also proprietor at the date of his death of the estate of Plantation, near Glasgow, part of which had been feued prior to his death. After his death his trustees gradually realised his estate, and after paying the annuities provided by the settlement and other expenses, they from time to time, between 1867 and 1895, divided the balance of the proceeds in their hands as directed.

On 25th October 1896 Charles M'Lean died survived by a widow, Mrs Ada Marriner M'Lean, and two daughters, Olivia Rachel Nora M'Lean and Elfrida Mary Hamilton M'Lean. In 1882 Charles M'Lean had assigned his interest as residuary legatee under his father's settlement to trustees. He left a will by which he appointed his wife his sole executrix, and to be guardian of his children during their minorities.

After the death of Charles M'Lean, a question arose as to the manner in which one-sixth of the residue of William M'Lean's estate, still in the hands of the trustees, was to be dealt with, and a special case was presented by (1) the trustees under William M'Lean's settlement; (2) Charles M'Lean's daughters and their mother as their guardian; (3) Mrs Ada Marriner M'Lean as sole executrix under Charles M'Lean's will; and (4) the trustees under the assignation granted by Charles M'Lean, in order to obtain the opinion of the Court on the following questions:—“(1) Was the one-sixth of the residue of the estate of the truster, the said William M'Lean, still in the possession of the first parties, vested in the deceased Charles M'Lean at the date of his death; and if so, was said one-sixth validly assigned by said assignation granted by him? or (2) In the event of the preceding question being answered in the negative, did said one-sixth of said residue vest in the said Olivia Rachel Nora M'Lean and Elfrida Mary Hamilton M'Lean on the death of their father, so far as the same is still in the possession of the first parties as trustees? or otherwise, is vesting thereof postponed until the first parties have realised and divided said part of said residue?”

The fourth parties maintained that one-sixth of said residue was vested in Charles M'Lean at the date of said assignation, or at least prior to the date of his death, and that said one-sixth share was effectually carried by said assignation, and fell to be paid to the fourth parties. The second parties, on the other hand, maintained that the one-sixth of the residue still remaining unrealised in the hands of the first parties was not vested in Charles M'Lean at or prior to the date of his death, and that it, if vested at all in him, was vested in him subject to defeasance in the event of his dying prior to the realisation thereof leaving lawful issue, and therefore did not fall to be paid to the fourth parties, but that said share vested in the two daughters of the said Charles M'Lean on his death, or otherwise, that it would vest in them when the first parties had realised and paid over the remaining residue of the truster's estate, and would fall to be paid to them, or retained by the first parties for their behoof until majority or marriage.

Argued for the fourth parties;—The residue vested at the period of division. That was a single period, and occurred at the testator's death, or as soon thereafter as the "foregoing provisions" had been provided for, or a reasonable time allowed for that purpose. The declaration that, in the event of the legatees dying before the division of the residue, their issue should take was not a proper destination, and did not postpone vesting.¹ The postponement of payment was merely for purposes of convenient realisation, and the case was a contrast to White's Trustees,² where a discretion was given to the trustees to withhold payment of the shares of residue in whole or in part, with an express provision that, in the event of any legatee dying before receiving payment of the whole of his share, so much as should remain in the hands of the trustees should pass to his issue.

No. 171.

June 29, 1897.
Maclean's
Trustees v.
Maclean.

Argued for the second parties;—The gift consisted in a direction to divide "after the foregoing purposes are served," and there could be no vesting at death, there being a postponement of payment and a destination over to the issue of those primarily called.³ The true view was that there were successive periods of vesting when the portions of residue in fact were paid or became divisible. The testator had expressed no preference for any particular period of vesting, but had made vesting dependent on division, and had left it to the trustees to fix the periods of division. The result was that vesting was postponed until the actual periods of division fixed by the trustees.⁴

LORD M'LAREN.—The question raised in this case is one which it was very proper to bring under the consideration of the Court in this form, because there are cases where the distribution or division of the estate upon which vesting depends may in certain circumstances be affected by the acts of trustees. In a case like the present, where the truster evidently contemplated a trust of long duration, and gave the trustees power to realise the heritage at successive times, it is quite possible that he might have intended that the right to the estates successively realised should belong to his sons and daughters surviving at these times. A slight variation in the language used might possibly have led to this result. In such cases it is safe to begin with the proposition that it is not to be presumed that the period of vesting is referred to the discretion of the trustees, though I am far from saying that this is impossible, or that if the truster says so in plain terms, his expressed intention is not to receive effect. If we hold vesting to be postponed, our decision must proceed on some definite expression of intention on the part of the testator. Now, I find nothing in the clauses under consideration except directions in regard to the administration and distribution of the estate. The direction is that the residue is to be divided among children named, and the issue of a deceased daughter and the survivors, and then follows a general substitution of issue to their parents in terms which I do not need to read. It was argued that, in the great majority of cases, when the Court has had to construe clauses directing estate to be divided among persons named and the survivors, it has been

¹ Richard's Trustees v. Roland, Dec. 7, 1894, 22 R. 140.

² White's Trustees v. White, June 20, 1896, 23 R. 836.

³ Adams' Trustees v. Carrick, June 18, 1896, 23 R. 828.

⁴ Chambers' Trustees v. Smiths, April 15, 1878, 5 R. (H. L.) 151; White's Trustees v. White, June 20, 1896, 23 R. 836.

No. 171.

June 29, 1897.
 Maclean's
 Trustees v.
 Maclean.

held that the survivorship is referable to a period subsequent to the death of the testator. If that is so, I think the reason is not difficult to divine. It is that, where there is no postponement of the division, no one would think of coming to the Court, because, if the direction is to divide a residue amongst the members of a class and the survivors, and there is no postponement of the distribution, survivors can only mean survivors at the testator's death. Now, when we come to consider the period to which survivorship is referable in this case, the terms of the clause point only to the period of the testator's death, because the division is to be made "after the foregoing purposes are served." There might have been purposes so conceived as to make it impossible to proceed to a division of the estate, but the purposes referred to are merely the provision of certain annuities, and annuities which the truster himself has said may be provided for by the purchase of securities. I think that in directing the residue to be divided the testator means only what remains after this has been done, the word "after," while primarily referable to time, referring here not to time but to the amount remaining when the annuities have been provided for.

When we come to the discretionary part of the will, where the trustees are directed to sell with the view of obtaining as large a sum as possible, I find no expressions referring back to the previous part of the will so as to affect the vesting under the residuary clause. It therefore appears to me to be clear that a division of the estate is to be made at the testator's death for the purpose of ascertaining the persons entitled to succeed, though it may be that the sale and payment of the proceeds would not take place until long after, and only upon the realisation of successive portions of the estate.

In my opinion Charles M'Lean took a vested interest, and was entitled to grant an assignation which was effectual to carry his share of what had been divided, as well as what remained to be divided.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

LORD ADAM concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative.

MILLAR, ROBSON, & M'LEAN, W.S.—J. A. CAMPBELL & LAMOND, C.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 172.

June 30, 1897.
 M'Laughlin v.
 Glasgow
 Tramway and Omnibus Co.,
 Limited.

JOHN T. M'LAUGHLIN, Pursuer.—Jameson.

THE GLASGOW TRAMWAY AND OMNIBUS COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders.
 —Constable.

Expenses—Tender—Delay in accepting.—In an action of damages for personal injury, the pursuer was found liable in part of the expenses incurred between the date on which a tender was made and the date of acceptance in respect of undue delay in accepting the tender.

1ST DIVISION.

THIS was an action of damages for personal injury at the instance of John T. M'Laughlin against the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company, Limited.

The case, which had been postponed from the Spring Sittings of the No. 172.
First Division, was ultimately put down for trial before a Judge of that Division on Monday, 28th June.

During the month of May three successive tenders were made of £30, £100, and £200.

On Saturday 19th June intimation was given to the pursuer's agents that the defenders were to make a tender of £250, and a minute formally making a tender of that amount was duly lodged on Monday, 21st June. This tender was accepted on Saturday, 26th June.

Upon the pursuer moving for decree in terms of the minute of tender with expenses to the date of acceptance, the defenders submitted that there had been undue delay in accepting the tender,¹ and moved for expenses from Monday 21st June on which date they argued the tender should have been accepted.

The pursuer submitted that there had been no undue delay in accepting the tender. The minute had only been lodged on Monday the 21st, and on that day there was a consultation of doctors in Glasgow to consider the extent of the pursuer's injuries. Until the result of that consultation was known nothing could be done, and Tuesday and Wednesday were Court holidays.*

THE COURT found the pursuer entitled to the expenses incurred by him down to and including June 24th, and found the defenders entitled to expenses after that date.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

COUNTESS OF LEITRIM AND OTHERS (Earl of Leitrim's Trustees, Owners No. 173. of the "Rossgull"), Pursuers (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson —Younger.

G. & J. BURNS (Owners of the "Spaniel"), Defenders (Appellants).—
Salvesen—Burns.

Et e contra.

Ship—Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collision at sea under Order of Council, 11th August 1884, arts. 13 and 18.—The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea under Order of Council, 11th August 1884, provide, inter alia,—Article 13.—"Every ship, whether a sailing ship, or steamship, shall, in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed." Article 18.—"Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary."

Early on the morning of 2d January the s.s. "Spaniel" entered a very thick fog off the island of Arran and slowed down to "dead slow"—about 3½ knots an hour. Shortly afterwards she heard whistles right ahead, or a little on her port bow, and her helm was ported, but she continued to advance dead slow, and was almost immediately afterwards struck by the s.s. "Rossgull," which proved to be the vessel from which the whistles had proceeded.

In cross actions of damages, the "Rossgull," which had been proceeding at full speed, ultimately admitted that she was in fault.

Held that the "Spaniel" was also in fault in respect that she had violated art. 18 by not stopping and reversing when she heard the whistles right ahead, or a little on her port bow.

¹ Shaw v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., Nov. 28, 1863, 2 Macph.
142, 36 Scot. Jur. 73.

* Tuesday, 22d June, and Wednesday, 23d, were held as Court holidays in celebration of Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee.

June 30, 1897.
M'Laughlin v.
Glasgow
Tramway and Omnibus Co.,
Limited.

June 30, 1897.
Owners of the
"Rossgull" v.
Owners of the
"Spaniel."

No. 173. IN April and May 1896 the testamentary trustees of Robert Birmingham, Earl of Leitrim, owners of the steamship "Rossgull" of Londonderry, and G. & J. Burns, owners of the steamship "Spaniel" of Glasgow, raised cross actions of damages in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, on account of a collision between these two vessels, which took place early in the morning of 2d January 1896, in a thick bank of fog off the island of Arran. The actions were conjoined. Upon record each party maintained that the collision was due solely to the fault of the other.*

June 30, 1897.
Owners of the
"Rossgull" v.
Owners of the "Spaniel."
2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The following epitome of the result of a proof is taken from the Sheriff-substitute's note:—"The s.s. 'Rossgull,' 90 tons register, 130 feet long, belonging to the parties Leitrim and others, was, during the night and early morning of 2d January last, on a voyage from Greenock to Portrush. The captain went below about 11.25 p.m., off Wemyss Bay. At that time the night was dark but clear. The 'Rossgull' was left by him in charge of the mate, Archibald Campbell, a certificated master. No other person remained with the mate on deck except the steersman, John M'Connell, A.B. It began to be a little hazy near the Cumbræes, and the 'Rossgull's' whistle was blown occasionally. From the Cumbræes her course had been S.W. by S. $\frac{1}{4}$ S. Catching a glimpse of Holy Island as they passed the north end of Lamlash Bay, the mate altered his course a $\frac{1}{4}$ of a point to S.W. by S. $\frac{1}{2}$ S. Immediately thereafter she ran into a bank of very thick fog at the back of Holy Island. This was about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour before the collision. Several steam whistles in different directions were heard by the mate or the steersman, more especially two whistles were heard pretty nearly ahead, which must have been from the 'Spaniel.' But the 'Rossgull' continued to go at her full speed, which is about 10 knots, for the purpose, apparently, of picking up the light at the south end of Holy Island at her correct time.

"Meantime the s.s. 'Spaniel,' 250 feet long, belonging to the parties G. & J. Burns, on a voyage from Belfast to Glasgow, and under the command of Captain Horner, entered the same bank of fog, also about a quarter of an hour before the collision. From Dippen Point, in Arran, her course had been N.E. by N. magnetic. When she entered the fog, the captain had the engines slowed from full speed to dead slow, so that, in Captain Horner's opinion, she was going $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 knots an hour at the time of the collision. Several whistles were heard from the 'Spaniel,' notably two right ahead, or a little on the port bow, which must have been from the 'Rossgull.' To avoid the vessel thus whistling, the 'Spaniel's' course was altered to east by south, which she was steering at the time of the collision.†

* The following articles of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, under Order of Council, 11th August 1884, were referred to:—

Article 13.—"Every ship, whether a sailing ship or steamship, shall, in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed."

Article 18.—"Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary."

† William Horner, the master of the "Spaniel," deponed,—“When we got into the fog I slowed the engines to ‘dead slow,’ and from that time onwards we were going ‘dead slow.’ I kept the whistle going regularly, in the usual way, at short intervals, with a man standing by the whistle. The fog was dense. Sometime after entering the fog I heard a whistle right "About two o'clock those in the 'Rossgull' first noticed the red port light of the 'Spaniel,' within 200 feet off. The helm of the 'Rossgull' was immediately put hard to port, and the engines immediately stopped and reversed, but it is clear that the way was not all off her at the time of the collision. The 'Spaniel,' about the same instant, or soon thereafter, noticed the mast-head of the 'Rossgull'; no change was made on her course or engines. The 'Rossgull' struck the 'Spaniel' at an acute angle. She got entangled with the 'Spaniel,' and being much lighter, was pulled round by the 'Spaniel' as she surged forward. Both vessels were injured by the collision."

No. 173.

June 30, 1897.
Owners of the
"Rossgull" v.
Owners of the
"Spaniel."

On 2d December 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the s.s. 'Rossgull,' belonging to the parties Leitrim and others, on 2d January last, at 2 a.m., in a dense fog, collided off Holy Island with the s.s. 'Spaniel,' belonging to the parties Burns & Company, and both vessels were injured, and actions of damages have been raised by both parties, which have been conjoined: Finds (2), for the reasons assigned in the note annexed hereto, that the said collision occurred through faults on the part of those in charge of both vessels, and that therefore the rule as to the allocation of the loss in such cases comes into play, and in the meantime reserves to pronounce further."*

ahead, a little on the port bow if anything. Upon that I gave an order to port, and after that to steady, and then I ported a little more—still keeping the other whistle on the port bow. The whistle did not seem to become much broader on my port bow as the result of the porting; it was still on the port bow, and I steadied. I heard a whistle broad off on our starboard beam, and another on the starboard quarter; they were two different whistles on the starboard side. (Q.) But these were not the whistles of the vessel that ultimately came into you, were they? (A.) Not at all. I had in view that there were obviously several ships about me; I heard the whistles. The first I saw of the approaching ship was the mast-head light; just immediately abaft the fore-rigging. She looked about 50 feet away, I should say, when I first saw the light. I thought I was going to get past. I thought she was going parallel, but immediately after I saw the hull of the ship, and then she came crash into the 'Spaniel' instantly. I account for the 'Rossgull' striking us by her starboarding her helm."

Alexander Carmichael, look-out on the "Spaniel," deposed,—“After getting into the fog, I reported a whistle sharp on the port bow; that is a true account of where I heard it coming from. I heard it several times. It was coming more aft on the port bow, but nearer to us all the time. I did not see anything then, but afterwards I saw a bright light; I saw the mast-head light and the hull of the vessel all at once and she was into us. I saw the light and the hull just as she was coming into us. She came in about our fore-rigging, about four or five points off the port bow. The collision happened immediately after that.”

* “NOTE.—(After the narrative given above)—Which vessel was in fault, or were both? It is clear, in the first place, that the 'Rossgull' was in fault. She had no business to be going at full speed through a dense fog, which a number of whistles shewed concealed a number of vessels; in breach, clearly, of articles 13 and 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea; especially as from the whistles she knew she was approaching another ship, and this fault contributed to the collision.

“The case of the 'Spaniel' is not quite so clear. She had no business to alter her course in the fog so seriously as to run E. by S. She might thereby have well deceived, as to her position, any vessel that had heard her previous whistles. Rule 15 does not apply, except in cases where vessels

No. 173. Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute, on 18th March 1897, in terms of a joint minute, found that the damage sustained by the "Rossgull" amounted to £840, and that sustained by the "Spaniel" to £548; and on 30th March, in the action at the instance of the owners of the "Rossgull," decerned against the owners of the "Spaniel" for £146, and in the action at the instance of the owners of the "Spaniel" assolizied the owners of the "Rossgull."

June 30, 1897.
Owners of the
"Rossgull" v.
Owners of the
"Spaniel."

The owners of the "Spaniel" appealed; the owners of the "Rossgull" acquiesced in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

Argued for the owners of the "Spaniel";—The "Rossgull" had now admitted that she was in fault; she was going at full speed through a dense fog, and so was violating article 13, and also article 18, if, as she maintained against the "Spaniel," there was a risk of collision. That being so, the onus was on the "Rossgull" to shew that the "Spaniel" was also in fault. Now she was going "dead slow" against the tide, and she was therefore obeying article 13. The or their lights are seen. Still, the Sheriff-substitute is not convinced that the error of the 'Spaniel' was one of the causes of the collision.

"But rules 13 and 18 apply in the case of the 'Spaniel' as well as in the case of the 'Rossgull,' though in a minor degree. Rule 13, that in a fog a vessel must go at moderate speed, applies whether or not there is reason to believe that another vessel is being approached. Had there been no such reason, however, it might fairly well be said that $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 knots was only 'a moderate speed.' But from the 'Rossgull's' whistles the 'Spaniel' must have known that she was approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision.

"In these circumstances, in such a dense fog, so dense that clearly the whole length of the 'Spaniel' could hardly be visible from her own deck, even $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 knots was too great a speed. This also contributed to the collision.

"The Sheriff-substitute is therefore of opinion that the collision was caused by the faults of those in charge of both vessels. The rule as to allocation of damages in such cases must therefore apply. Both parties have agreed in deferring the questions of the amount of damage till the decision of the question of liability. It will therefore be for the parties either to come to some arrangement as to the amount of damage, or to have another diet of proof fixed for the determination of these questions.

"A number of cases have been referred to on both sides,—specially those of the 'Nerano,' 22 R. 237, and the English cases of the 'Kirby Hall,' 1883, L. R., 8 Prob. Div. 71; the 'Zadok' and the 'John Macintyre,' L. R., 9 Prob. Div. pp. 114 and 135 respectively; the 'Ceto,' 1889, L. R., 14 App. Cases, 670; the 'Dordogne,' 1884, 10 Prob. Div. 6; the 'Lancashire,' L. R. [1894], A. C. 1; the 'Resolution,' 1888, 6 Aspinal, 362; 'Vindomora,' 1889, L. R., 14 Prob. Div. 172, and [1891], A. C. 1, may be referred to as bearing more or less on the present case.

"The case of the 'Zadok' was referred to by the parties Burns as shewing that a vessel, under article 13, has only to reduce her speed so far as she can consistently with keeping steerage-way.

"The 'Zadok,' a sailing vessel, was going about 5 knots, which was held in the circumstances to be too fast. But the point raised was simply under rule 13, as rule 18, about stopping and reversing, only applies to steamers. The rule about stopping and reversing must necessarily, to some extent, interfere with steerage-way in certain circumstances.

"The 'John Macintyre' was the case of a steamer in similar circumstances, and it was held that her duty was to stop and reverse; and the 'Kirby Hall' was another of a very similar nature. Really, in a fog, the question is more one of common sense and reasonable care than of law."

only question consequently was, whether she had violated article 18, No. 173. and so far as the first part of article 18 was concerned she had obeyed that in obeying article 13, for she had already slackened her speed. Thus the case against her turned upon whether she ought also to have stopped and reversed. This part of article 18 was not imperative. Stopping and reversing was to take place only if necessary. It must be shewn that in the whole circumstances of the particular case there was a reasonably apparent risk of collision if the vessel did not stop and reverse.¹ To construe article 18 as laying down a hard and fast rule that the master of a vessel must always stop and reverse whenever he heard the whistle of another vessel would be productive of more danger than safety in a crowded locality such as the evidence shewed this to have been, for of course what applied to one vessel applied to all. Article 18, which was, not like article 13, confined to cases of fog and snow, contemplated that the master should have reasonable grounds for concluding that stopping and reversing was the proper course to pursue. In the present case the master of the "Spaniel" had not such grounds. He did not know, and could not assume, that the "Rossgull" was flagrantly violating the regulations by going at full speed through a fog.² Besides, it was apparently the Sheriff-substitute's opinion—and that opinion was supported by the evidence—that the sole cause of the collision was the fault of the "Rossgull"—that the collision would have occurred whether the "Spaniel" had reversed or not.

Argued for the owners of the "Rossgull";—The "Rossgull" did not now dispute that she had been in fault, but she maintained that the "Spaniel" was also in fault in this sense, that the "Spaniel" had violated one or more of the regulations which were applicable to the particular case. Assuming that the "Spaniel" had sufficiently complied with article 13, there remained article 18, and this the "Spaniel" had violated. It was clear on the evidence that the master of the "Spaniel" knew, or ought as a competent nautical man to have known, that a vessel was approaching him in such a way as to make a collision almost certain if both vessels continued on their course, and therefore article 18 applied and required the "Spaniel" to stop and reverse. It was nothing to the point that the "Rossgull" ought equally to have stopped and reversed. Nor was it to the point to urge that the "Rossgull's" fault was flagrant, and the "Spaniel's" venial. It might even be that the "Spaniel's" fault in no way contributed to the collision—that the collision would have taken place whatever the "Spaniel" had done. Such considerations had no relevancy to questions like the present. Fault here did not mean negligence causing, or contributing to, the damage; it meant the violation of a regulation applicable to the particular circumstances. It was a relevant answer to say, that the regulation, even if violated, had no application to the circumstances; but it was not a relevant answer, that the violation of the regulation admitted or proved to be applicable did not in fact cause any damage.³

¹ The "Vindomora" L. R. [1891], A. C. 1; The "Lancashire," L. R. [1894], A. C. 1; The "Nerano" v. The "Dromedary," Jan. 10, 1895, 22 R. 237.

² The "Thorsa," June 23, 1893, 20 R. 876, per the Lord Justice-Clerk at p. 884.

³ The "Kirby Hall," 1883, L. R. 8 P. D. 71; The "Ebor," 1886, L. R. 11 P. D. 25; The "Duke of Buccleuch," L. R. [1891] A. C. 310.

No. 173. At advising,—

June 30, 1897.
Owners of the
"Rossgull" v.
Owners of the
"Spaniel."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case turns on the question whether one of two vessels which came into collision in the Firth of Clyde was at fault, the other being admittedly at fault. The "Rossgull" entered the fog and proceeded on her course at full speed, which was quite contrary to the regulations. Accordingly, it is not disputed that the "Rossgull" is to blame. The question is whether the "Spaniel," which was coming in the opposite direction, was also to blame. The conduct of those in command of the "Spaniel" was this, that, hearing the whistle of another vessel almost directly ahead, they continued on their course at the same speed as they were then running at, viz., dead slow, and on hearing the whistle repeated, they still continued at dead slow, and at the same time altered the course of their vessel to a small extent. In the circumstances, I think that the "Spaniel" ought to have stopped and reversed, when it was known that a vessel was approaching and was nearly directly ahead, and in any case should have stopped and reversed when after an interval it was ascertained that she was still nearly directly ahead. This was not done until the other vessel was seen through the fog, and it was then too late to avoid collision. The conclusion that I have come to is, that the "Spaniel" is also to blame.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur in thinking that both vessels were in fault, and must be held responsible for the collision.

LORD TRAYNER.—These conjoined actions arise out of a collision which occurred between the "Rossgull" and the "Spaniel" in the Firth of Clyde in January 1896. Both vessels were damaged, and each blames the other as being the sole cause of the collision. The Sheriff-substitute has found that both vessels were in fault, and has dealt with the joint damages according to the usual rule. The owners of the "Rossgull" admit the fault alleged against their vessel, and acquiesce in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, but the owners of the "Spaniel" maintain that their vessel was not in fault and claim absolutor. After a careful consideration of the case and the proof adduced, I have come to be of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute is right. I think it quite clear that the "Spaniel" was not so much to blame for what happened as the "Rossgull," but more or less fault does not affect the result in cases of this class. The facts which appear to me to establish fault on the part of the "Spaniel" are to be found in the evidence of the master of that vessel and the seaman who was on the look out when the collision occurred.

The vessels were both in a dense fog, and the "Spaniel" was proceeding as I think at a moderate rate of speed as required by article 13. But the master says that he "heard a whistle right ahead, a little on the port bow, if anything," that to give the vessel whistling a wider berth he ported a little, and that, notwithstanding this, the whistle did not "become much broader" on the port bow. The man on the look out gives evidence to the same effect. He heard and reported a whistle "sharp on the port bow," heard the whistle several times, coming more aft on the port bow, but "nearer to us all the time." This whistle ahead, "coming nearer all the time," gave the master of the "Spaniel" warning that there was a vessel ahead of him coming in his direction, and being "sharp on the port bow," No. 173. involved a risk of collision undoubtedly. In these circumstances, it was the duty of the "Spaniel" to stop and reverse, according to article 18, as it has been interpreted and applied in many cases, of which the case of the "Rossgull" v. Owners of the "Ceto"¹ may be taken as an example. Not having complied with the provisions of that rule, the "Spaniel" must be deemed to have been in fault, and therefore jointly liable with the "Rossgull" for the damage done. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD MONCREIFF.—On full consideration of the evidence and the authorities cited, I am satisfied that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment is right, and for the reasons which he gives. In his note he says,—“But rules 13 and 18 apply in the case of the ‘Spaniel’ as well as in the case of the ‘Rossgull,’ though in a minor degree. Rule 13, that in a fog a vessel must go at moderate speed, applies whether or not there is reason to believe that another vessel is being approached. Had there been no such reason, however, it might fairly well be said that $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 knots was only ‘a moderate speed.’ But from the ‘Rossgull’s’ whistles the ‘Spaniel’ must have known that she was approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision. In these circumstances, in such a dense fog, so dense that clearly the whole length of the ‘Spaniel’ could hardly be visible from her own deck, even $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 knots was too great a speed. This also contributed to the collision.”

This passage states concisely and accurately the import of the evidence and the conclusions to be drawn from it. What at first gave some colour to the appellants' argument was, that while the "Rossgull" was proved to be flagrantly in fault, going at a speed of 10 knots an hour in a dense fog, the "Spaniel" was going dead slow. But as it is proved that those in charge of the "Spaniel" must have known, from repeated whistles on the port bow, that a vessel was approaching nearly right ahead, and as the fog was so dense that a vessel could not be seen beyond 50 feet, I think the "Spaniel" was bound to stop and reverse.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, found in fact in terms of the findings in fact in the interlocutor of 2d December 1896, and affirmed the interlocutor of 30th March 1897.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

ALEXANDER MACASKILL, Applicant.—J. H. Millar.
NORMAN MAGNUS M'LEOD, Objector.—C. K. Mackenzie.

No. 174.

Poor's-roll—Circumstances warranting admission.—Held that a workman earning 31s. 6d. a week, with a wife and two children dependent on him, who had been found to have a probabilis causa litigandi, was not entitled to the benefit of the poor's-roll. June 30, 1897.
Macaskill v. M'Leod.

ALEXANDER MACASKILL, joiner, Fort-William, applied for admission to the poor's-roll, in order to raise an action against M'Leod of M'Leod and John Macaskill, Kilmuir, Skye, the applicant's brother,

¹ L. R., 14 App. Cas. 670.

No. 174. for reduction of a lease, dated 31st June 1885, granted by M'Leod of M'Leod in favour of the applicant's father, Ewen Macaskill, and for declarator that the applicant was tenant of the subjects leased, for decree of removing against John Macaskill, for an accounting against him, and for damages.

June 30, 1897.
Macaskill v.
M'Leod.

On 14th May the application was remitted to the reporters on probabilis causa litigandi, who, on 4th June, reported that counsel for the parties admitted that the applicant was earning 31s. 6d. a week, and that on this wage he supported his wife and two children, and paid £16 of rent for his house; that his only property was his household furniture; and that, on the merits, in their opinion the applicant had a probabilis causa litigandi.

Counsel for the applicant moved for admission.

Counsel for the objector argued;—No applicant with such a wage and so small a family had ever been admitted. In the strongest case for Macaskill,¹ the applicant had four children dependent on him, and he sought to raise an action of damages for personal injury. This was a reduction of a lease which had existed since 1885. Even in the case of Paterson,¹ Lord Rutherford Clark dissented. In ordinary circumstances, a man earning 23s. a week was not entitled to admission.² In the case of a net income of £53 per annum doubt had been expressed of the applicant's eligibility.³

Argued for the applicant;—It was admitted that a wage of 27s. a week was the highest limit at which an applicant had ever been admitted, but the proper test was whether a litigant could pay for counsel and agent in the Court of Session,⁴ and it was clear that this was impossible on 31s. 6d. a week. In *Anderson*⁴ the applicant only earned 15s. a week, but his son, who lived with him, earned £1 a week. An applicant with 30s. a week was refused,⁵ but on the ground that the action should have been brought in the Small-Debt Court.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If this application had come before us as a new thing, for my own part I should consider it absolutely necessary to give it the most careful consideration, and consider whether such an application should be refused, because I think that not only the nature of the case but the circumstances and time require to be taken into consideration. But I do not myself feel at liberty to go against what has been apparently an established rule of the Court for some time, and what has been practically acted upon in recent times, and therefore I am for refusing this application.

LORD YOUNG.—It is perhaps altogether superfluous for me to repeat what I have had an opportunity of saying, and have said on former occasions, but I may take the liberty of saying now that I consider this matter had better be considered and put upon a right footing—that is, a reasonable footing—either by statute or by Act of Sederunt. The sense and reason for admission to the poor's-roll is to aid poor people who are not in worldly

¹ Paterson v. Linlithgow Police Commissioners, July 4, 1888, 15 R. 826.

² Robertson, July 8, 1880, 7 R. 1092, per Lord President Inglis.

³ Stevens v. Stevens, Jan. 23, 1885, 12 R. 548.

⁴ Stevens v. Stevens, supra, per Lord Young, p. 549; Anderson v. Blackwood, July 11, 1885, 12 R. 1263, per Lord Young, p. 1264.

⁵ Wright v. Kerr, Feb. 27, 1890, 17 R. 516.

circumstances to enable them to carry on a litigation in this Court, if they have a probabilis causa litigandi. There is no other reason or sense in it. I think that will be admitted by everybody. The professional bodies have with great generosity appointed members of their own professions, both law-agents and counsel, to conduct such cases, and they also appoint members of their own profession to consider the circumstances of individual cases—whether it is fitting that they should give their professional services upon these exceptional terms—without pay—in the individual cases. Every case in which such an application is made upon a report of probabilis causa litigandi made by the professional bodies, who give their services gratuitously in cases in which they are satisfied, is of that character. Well, as I have said before, when a party is really in poverty, which a man with a family and 25s. or 30s. a week really is, and the professional bodies—both counsel and agents—are ready and willing to give their services in the individual case, having looked into it, we can hardly say (it is not reasonable or sensible)—“Oh! but he has plenty of money to pay.” It is nonsense in the estimation of anybody who is acquainted with the practice of this Court and the expense of litigation in this Court, to say that a man with 30s. a week has money sufficient to pay his way. Well, then, the poor’s-roll is just to aid people who have not money to pay their way. If there is an Act of Parliament, which can only be altered by the Legislature, declaring that anybody with 25s. a week has money to pay his way in a litigation in the Court of Session, we must bow to that, whatever the good sense of it may be; and if there is an Act of Sederunt, which cannot be altered at least without a majority of the Court, and the majority decline, being of opinion that 25s. a week is quite sufficient for anybody to support a wife and family and to carry on litigation, we must bow to that too, and if that is the position in which this matter stands I bow respectfully; but at the same time I take the liberty of repeating what I began with—that I think it would be better if this matter were put on a satisfactory footing, quite distinctly decided, and that in putting it on that footing the good sense and reason of the thing should be taken account of.

LORD TRAYNER.—Following the authorities as they at present stand, I am of opinion that we have no alternative but to refuse this application.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT refused the application.

JAMES M’WILLIAM, S.S.C.—BLAIR & FINLAY, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES WILKINSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Watt—A. S. D. Thomson. No. 175.
THE KINNEIL CANNEL AND COKING COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour—Salvesen.

July 1, 1897.
Wilkinson v
Kinneil
Cannel and
Coking Coal
Co., Limited.

Reparation—Volenti non fit injuria—Risk voluntarily incurred to save another’s life—Master and Servant.—The father of a boy, thirteen years and four months old, raised an action against a coal company for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on account of injuries sustained by the boy when in the defenders’ employment. The pursuer averred that while the boy and another employee of the defenders were

No. 175.

July 1, 1897.
 Wilkinson v.
 Kinneil
 Cannel and
 Coking Coal
 Co., Limited.

standing on a coal waggon at the pithead of the defenders' pit trimming coal, an uncontrolled waggon was allowed (through the fault of a person entrusted with the superintendence of the shunting operations at the pithead) to approach the waggon on which the boy and his companion were standing at great speed on a down incline on the same line of rails; that the boy's companion, from his position on the stationary waggon, could not see the approaching waggon, but that the boy, "upon suddenly observing the near approach of the waggon running with great speed and force, in a moment of hurry and confusion, incident to his surroundings, and the extreme danger to himself and the said" companion, "jumped from the buffer of the stationary waggon, and seizing a wooden pit prop, about 5 or 6 feet in length, he 'snibbled' or stopped the waggon by inserting the prop between the spokes of one of the wheels and the body of the waggon. In doing so the momentum of the waggon caused one end of the prop to twist round with a sudden jerk, and, striking him on the stomach, threw him on his back, and his left arm falling on the rail, one of the waggon wheels passed over it from near the shoulder to the wrist. The waggon was stopped within 3 or 4 feet of the stationary waggon, and but for the piece of wood inserted in the wheel as aforesaid, . . . the two waggons would have come into violent collision, and been attended with great danger to the said" companion, "who was standing on the top of the coal in the stationary waggon, and also the said" boy.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

Held (by a majority of a Court of seven Judges) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue, per Lord Young, on the ground that the boy was, or on the evidence might be shewn to have been, under such a duty to attempt to save the life or limbs of his companion as to disentitle the defenders to a verdict on the plea that the boy's injuries were due to a risk voluntarily incurred by him; and per Lord M'Laren, Lord Kinneil, and Lord Moncreiff, on the ground that where two persons are exposed to a common danger through the fault of a third person, and one of the two persons, who might have saved himself, is injured in consequence of having, on the impulse of the moment, interposed to save his companion, it is a jury question whether these injuries are not fairly attributable to the fault of the person which gave rise to the common peril; diss. Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Adam, and Lord Trayner, on the ground that on the pursuer's averments the boy's injuries were due to a risk voluntarily incurred by him, outside the scope of his employment, and after he had put himself out of danger from the approaching waggon.

Expenses—Dominus Litis—Parent and Child.—An action of damages on account of personal injuries to a pupil boy was raised by the father of the boy "as tutor and administrator-in-law of" the boy. During the dependence of the action the boy became a minor, and thereafter an interlocutor was pronounced sisting him, "with consent and concurrence of" his father, "as his curator and administrator-in-law, as pursuer in room and in place of the said" father.

The defenders having obtained a verdict, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on their motion, granted decree for expenses against the father up to the date of sisting the boy as pursuer, and against the father and the boy conjunctly and severally subsequent to that date.

2D DIVISION,
 with three consulted Judges.
 Sheriff of
 Lanarkshire.

In June 1896, James Wilkinson senior, miner, Airdrie, as tutor and administrator-in-law of his pupil son, James Wilkinson junior, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Kinneil Cannel and Coking Coal Company, Limited, for £54, 13s., as damages due by the defenders under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on account of injuries sustained by James Wilkinson junior when in the employment of the defenders.

The pursuer averred that his son, a boy at the date of the action thirteen years and four months old, was on 29th January 1896, employed by the defenders at the pithead of a pit belonging to them, near Bo'ness; that on that day a railway waggon loaded with rubbish was pushed up a steep incline at the pithead by means of an engine belonging to the defenders in charge of David Grant, engine-driver in their employment, "who was a person entrusted with superintendence in shunting and removing waggons and material from one place to another, in the yard or grounds surrounding the pit"; that after reaching the top of the incline the waggon was unloaded and uncoupled from the engine; that Grant then "without having previously blown the whistle of the engine, or given any warning whatever, started his engine at the top of the incline, and running down the same, a distance of about 90 yards or thereby, at a high rate of speed and a considerable distance in advance of the waggon, drove his engine into a lye branching off to the right of the points, and allowed the waggon uncontrolled, and also at a high rate of speed, to run a straight course into the lye leading to the 'screes,' by which the coal from the pit hutches was passed into railway waggons. (Cond. 6) "At the time the waggon was so allowed to run into the lye leading to the 'screes,' a waggon, which was stationary, was in course of being loaded with coal. On the top of the coal in this stationary waggon there was a person in the employment of the defenders named Alexander Steel, whose duty it was to build and trim the coal in the waggons intended for transit by rail. The pursuer's son, the said James Wilkinson junior, was also engaged at this waggon picking stones and dirt from the coal as it was passed over the 'screes,' and assisting in trimming the coal. To enable him to do this work he was standing upon one of the buffers at the east end of the waggon, which was the usual and customary place for persons engaged at this work to stand. The said Alexander Steel, from his position on the waggon, and the construction of a wooden shed erected immediately over the 'screes,' could not see when a waggon was run into the lye. When the waggon was allowed to run down the lye in the manner before described, the said James Wilkinson junior was the only person engaged at the 'screes' who had an opportunity of seeing the waggon coming down, and upon suddenly observing the near approach of the waggon running with great speed and force, in a moment of hurry and confusion, incident to his surroundings, and the extreme danger to himself and the said Alexander Steel, jumped from the buffer of the stationary waggon, and seizing a wooden pit prop about five or six feet in length, he 'snibbled' or stopped the waggon by inserting the prop between the spokes of one of the wheels and the body of the waggon. In doing so the momentum of the waggon caused one end of the prop to twist round with a sudden jerk, and, striking him on the stomach, threw him on his back, and, his left arm falling on the rail, one of the waggon wheels passed over it from near the shoulder to the wrist. The waggon was stopped within three or four feet of the stationary waggon, and but for the piece of wood inserted in the wheel as aforesaid by the said James Wilkinson junior, the two waggons would have come into violent collision, and been attended with great danger to the said Alexander Steel, who was standing on the top of the coal in the stationary waggon, and also the said James Wilkinson junior."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant.

No. 175.

July 1, 1897.
 Wilkinson v.
 Kinneil
 Cannel and
 Coking Coal
 Co., Limited.

No. 175.

July 1, 1897.
 Wilkinson v.
 Kinneil
 Cannel and
 Coking Coal
 Co., Limited.

On 29th July 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) allowed a proof before answer.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial.

When the case came up in the Second Division for adjustment of issues, parties were heard on the question of relevancy.

Thereafter on 1st December the cause was appointed to be heard before the Judges of the Division with the assistance of Lord Adam, Lord M'Laren, and Lord Kinnear.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the opinions.¹

At advising, on 11th March 1897,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case of the pursuer, as stated in the condescendence, is that while he was employed under the defenders in cleaning coal in a waggon, a waggon was, by the fault of an engine-driver, sent at a high speed down the lye on which the waggon he was working at was standing; that observing the waggon coming on, he jumped off, and seizing a wooden prop he tried to stop the waggon “by inserting it between the spokes of one of the wheels and the body of the waggon.” His averment is that he did this in a moment of hurry and confusion incident to his surroundings, and the extreme danger to himself and another workman who was on the waggon. In doing this he alleges he suffered certain injuries from the prop twisting round and striking him.

These averments come to this, that the pursuer having got on to the ground clear of the approaching waggon, took means to endeavour to prevent it running on and striking the waggon from which he had got down, and succeeded in stopping the waggon. That was conduct which may have been quite natural, and indeed laudable in the view of the fact that there was a fellow-workman on the waggon which was in the way of the moving waggon. But, contrary I believe to the opinion of the majority of your Lordships, I have been unable to come to the conclusion that they constitute a relevant case. What the pursuer did was the direct cause of the accident. At the time he did it he was not himself in the way of or liable to be injured by the moving waggon. In doing what he did he must have gone upwards on the lye to meet the waggon, as his averment is, that although it was going at a great speed, what he did had the effect of stopping the waggon before it reached the stationary one. I recognise it as an established rule that a person injured by an accident is not debarred from recovering damages because he did not, when he saw the danger, take the most wise course, or even if he did, in the agitation of the moment, take an unwise course in endeavouring to escape from it. But I have been unable to come to the conclusion that, where the pursuer's case discloses that after having taken himself out of danger, he did an act which it is not averred he had any duty or obligation to do, and which he therefore did voluntarily, and in consequence of his action received injuries, he can recover damages as for an injury caused by the fault of others.

My opinion is that the pursuer, upon the averments he has made, is not entitled to have an issue allowed, but that the action should be dismissed as irrelevant. I am aware that in one or two cases views have been expressed tending in the direction of holding that a person trying to save others in case of accident, although not in danger himself, may have a claim for damages if injured, but I am unable to assent to that view.

¹ Authorities cited.—Sutherland v. Monkland Railway Co., July 15, 1857, 19 D. 1004, 29 Scot. Jur. 475; Woods v. Caledonian Railway Co., July 9, 1886, 13 R. 1118; Memberry v. Great Western Railway Co., 1889, L. R., 14 App. Cas. 179; Beven on Negligence, vol. i. p. 179.

No. 175.

July 1, 1897.
 Wilkinson v.
 Kinneil
 Cannel and
 Coking Coal
 Co., Limited.

LORD YOUNG.—This at first appeared to me to be a clear case, but that opinion was of course modified when I found some of my brethren differing from the view which I had taken, and accordingly I cannot now regard it as a clear matter, although it at first appeared to me to be so.

There is here admittedly a relevant averment of fault on the part of the defenders. That is not disputed, and certainly the case would not have been sent to be argued before seven Judges upon any question as to the relevancy of the allegation of fault on their part. That fault lies in the fact that a waggon was run upon the lye specified at dangerous speed, and in a manner to expose to danger the truck in which the pursuer was engaged along with a fellow-workman. The pursuer was only a lad, and his companion was an elderly man, and the two of them were upon the truck which was exposed to danger. I assume, upon the question of relevancy, that the pursuer may prove at the trial the passage in the condescendence to which your Lordship in the chair has referred. The question is, whether, if that is proved, there is a good claim against the persons whose fault exposed those upon the waggon to danger; or rather, whether there is any objection to the relevancy of the pursuer's claim against them for the consequences to him of their fault. I have heard no objection to the relevancy except this, that when the pursuer's son jumped off and got to the ground he was in perfect safety, and that there was, as your Lordship expressed it, no duty or obligation upon him to interpose, after he was in safety, for the protection of his companion. I cannot assent to that view. I may be taken to agree that there was no such duty or obligation upon him as could have been legally enforced. I think the pursuer's son would not have been liable in damages as for a breach of legal obligation if he had not done what he did. But I must say that, in my opinion, there was a duty all the same. It was according to his duty, or may have been according to his duty, to interpose to save the life or limbs of his companion. I do not speak about interposing to save property, although that might raise a question worthy of consideration, but to save life or limb I think there was such a duty as the law will take account of, and I hold that if he performed such a duty it cannot be pleaded against him that he voluntarily exposed himself to danger in turning back on the spur of the moment to save his companion, and that instead of doing so he ought to have allowed his companion to take his chance of being killed. I cannot assent to that view. I am of opinion that the case ought to go to trial, and if it is proved that there was fault on the part of the defenders in having that waggon sent along that lye at a dangerous rate of speed, and that the pursuer's son interposed, although not in pursuance of a legal duty, but only as doing what was right and reasonable in the circumstances, and thereby met with an accident, he is not precluded from claiming damages because he was in safety and put himself out of safety in order to save another.

No. 175.

July 1, 1897.
Wilkinson v.
Kinneil
Cannel and
Coking Coal
Co., Limited.

LORD ADAM.—Wilkinson, the boy injured, was in the employment of the defenders, and part of his duty was the loading and trimming of waggons with coal from the pit. On the morning of the day on which the accident happened he was engaged in the duty of trimming coal on a waggon at the foot of an incline leading from the pithead. The fault alleged against the company is that an engine-driver allowed a waggon uncontrolled to run down the incline at a high rate of speed towards the waggon on which the boy and his fellow-workman were at work. No doubt if the waggons had come into collision the defenders would have been responsible for any damage done, because the damage would have been the natural and direct consequence of the fault alleged against the defenders' engine-driver, but it appears to me to be clear that the accident was not the natural and direct result of the waggon being allowed to run down the incline. Wilkinson, we are told, had jumped to the ground and was in perfect safety, and the accident was the direct and natural result of his endeavouring to stop or snibble the waggon. That might be a most meritorious act, but in doing it he was not discharging any duty to his master, whom it is now sought to make responsible. It was an act not within the scope of his employment, and therefore it appears to me that the master is not responsible in law for the consequence of that act of his servant. After the boy had jumped to the ground it seems to me that he was in the same position as if he had never been in the waggon at all. He voluntarily placed himself in a position of danger, and I do not see how any liability for the accident can be imposed upon the master.

LORD M'LAREN.—The facts of this case are not so clearly outside controversy that we can safely deal with the case as a question of relevancy. On the contrary, it is a case which ought to be sent to a jury in order that the law may be applied to the true facts of the case. But as observations have been made upon the law applicable to the facts as stated by the pursuer, I may say that it appears to me that there is no difference in principle between the views which have been expressed by the majority and those taken by the minority of the Court. I agree with your Lordship in the chair that if a person who is exposed to imminent danger through the fault of another takes reasonable means to save himself, he will not lose his claim for reparation because he has not taken the best possible means, or because he may have lost time in endeavouring to save a fellow-creature, and thereby be unable to avoid being hurt. On the other hand, if a person standing, say, by the way-side, and having no contract and no duty whatever in connection with either the stationary waggon or the one that is approaching, interferes to save life, I am unable to see how his act, meritorious as it might be, will give rise to any claim of compensation against the owner of the waggon. I think the present case may possibly fall within the first of the two categories I have referred to, because if the young man in endeavouring to save himself, quite laudably and properly considered whether he could not take his fellow-workman along with him, and did on the spur of the moment something which was not directly necessary for his own safety, I am not prepared to say that under all circumstances that will bar his claim to redress. A good deal must depend upon how the facts come out at the trial. Further, it is not to be overlooked that this young man had a duty to take care of his employers' waggon, and what he did in stopping the approaching waggon was calculated to avoid damage to the waggon on which he was working. If there was any duty of that kind, of course it would not be the less a duty to save his master's property because in doing so he also saved a fellow-workman from death or injury.

No. 175.
July 1, 1897.
Wilkinson v.
Kinneil
Cannel and
Coking Coal
Co., Limited.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with Lord Young and Lord M'Laren in thinking that this case ought to go to trial. According to the pursuer's statement, it is clear enough that his son was placed in a position of great danger by the negligence of the defenders, with the result, either immediate or remote, that the boy was very seriously injured. Now, if the mischief which happened was the direct and natural consequence of the defenders' negligence, the pursuer is entitled to recover. If the boy might have avoided the mischief by exercising ordinary care and diligence, then the injury must be held to be proximately due to his own want of care or his voluntary action, and not to the defenders' negligence. It is said against the pursuer, on his own statement on record, that the boy is in this latter position, because he, having jumped off the waggon, was in perfect safety, and would have escaped altogether if he had not voluntarily incurred a new danger by attempting to stop the waggon. That does not appear to me to be quite a fair construction of the pursuer's statement, because his averment is that, if the waggon had not been stopped, it would have come into violent collision with the other, and that this violent collision would have been attended with danger not only to Steele, but to the pursuer's son himself. But however this may be, I am not prepared to hold as matter of law that if one is exposed to danger by the fault of another, he has failed to exercise reasonable care and prudence for his own safety merely because he has paid regard to the safety of another as well as to his own, and so brought himself into further peril which he might have escaped if he had thought of nobody but himself, and has therefore no claim against the wrongdoer. Nor am I prepared to say, as matter of law, that his exposing himself to further risk in order to save a life which was in peril was not the natural or probable consequence of a fault which put both lives in danger. These are questions of fact which cannot be safely decided without consideration of all the circumstances of the case.

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuer in this case claims damages from the defenders for injuries sustained by his son while in the defenders' employment. The statement of the grounds of action set forth in the condescendence is clear and explicit. The injured lad, while engaged in the work which he had been employed to do, saw a waggon approaching him and another workman uncontrolled, and at a speed which threatened injury to them both. He left his work and went towards the approaching waggon, he "snibbled" or stopped the waggon before it had reached the point where it could have done the damage which its advance threatened, and in doing so he received the injuries complained of. This is, in effect, the pursuer's statement. I assume, in dealing with the question of relevancy, that the waggon was running uncontrolled at an improper and dangerous speed, and that this is a fault for which the defenders are responsible. But

No. 175.

July 1, 1897.
 Wilkinson v.
 Kinneil
 Cannel and
 Coking Coal
 Co., Limited.

assuming this, I am of opinion that no relevant case has been averred against the defenders inferring liability for what happened. The direct and immediate cause of the injuries to the pursuer's son was his own act. It was no part of his duty or employment to stop such a waggon—no one asked or ordered him to do it; and it is at least doubtful whether the defenders or anyone representing them could lawfully have ordered him to do so. The action of the pursuer's son was, in the strictest sense, voluntary, and volenti non fit injuria. Nor was this action necessary for the lad's own safety or the safety of his neighbour workman. The pursuer's son saw the approaching danger sufficiently early to provide for his own safety and for the safety of the other workman, if warning had then been given. As the pursuer's son got out of the way of danger in time, so could the workman, had the pursuer's son given warning. But the pursuer's son deliberately adopted a different course, and did that, as I have said, voluntarily, which resulted in his injury.

The pursuer's son, no doubt, did what he thought best for everybody, his employers included. His proceedings were well intentioned, and the defenders might very well make him some recompense. But I am unable to affirm their liability at law for the claim now made.

LORD MONCRIEFF.—I agree with those of your Lordships who hold that this case should be sent to trial. Difficulties may arise on the evidence, but in my opinion the pursuer's averments are relevant. Stated shortly, they are to the effect that his son James Wilkinson junior, and a fellow-workman Alexander Steele, were suddenly exposed to extreme danger owing to the fault of the defenders or those for whom they are responsible; that the boy saw the approaching waggon, but Steele could not, owing to the position in which he was standing; and that, "in a moment of hurry and confusion, incident to his surroundings, and the extreme danger to himself and the said Alexander Steele," the boy jumped from the buffer of the stationary waggon, and succeeded in stopping the approaching waggon, and preventing injury to Steele and the stationary waggon, but in doing so received the injuries complained of.

It is not disputed that if the pursuer's son had been content with trying to save himself, and been injured in doing so, he would, assuming fault on the part of the defenders, have been entitled to recover damages. But it is said that he is not entitled to recover because the boy could have saved himself, and indeed, it is said, had done so, and that in attempting to save Steele he acted ultroneously.

I think it is well settled that if a man is placed in a position of danger through the fault of another his actions in endeavouring to avoid injury to himself are not to be judged by the same standard as those of one who has time to act calmly in the knowledge of all the facts and the alternatives open to him. And if in the hurry of the moment he does not adopt the best means of securing his own safety, the wrongdoer will not thereby be freed from liability. I am of opinion that the same rule applies where two persons are exposed to a common danger, and one of them, who could, I assume, save himself, had he time to think and chose to do so, acts upon the natural and unselfish impulse of the moment, saves his companion, but is himself injured. I think it is a proper and legitimate jury question, No. 175. whether the actings of a person placed in such a position, and the consequent injuries sustained by him, are not fairly attributable to the fault of the person who placed him in peril.

July 1, 1897
Wilkinson v.
Kinneil
Cannel and
Coking Coal
Co., Limited.

In the present case, if it appears that the boy acted officiously and unnecessarily, the defenders will be assoilzied. But as on the pursuer's averments I see nothing to indicate that he acted as a volunteer, I think the case must go to trial.

The defenders having lodged a minute setting forth that James Wilkinson had attained minority, and having moved that he should be sisted as pursuer, the Court, on 16th March, pronounced this interlocutor:—

"In conformity with the opinion of the majority of the consulted Judges, sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor appealed against: Repel the first plea in law for the defenders: Approve of the issue No. 11 of process . . . to be the issue for the trial of the cause: Further, sist James Wilkinson junior, with consent and concurrence of James Wilkinson senior, as his curator and administrator-in-law, as pursuer in room and place of the said James Wilkinson senior, in terms of the minute No. 13 of process; and remit the cause to Lord Kyllachy to proceed therein as accords, with power to him to dispose of the expenses of this appeal as expenses in the cause."

The cause was tried before Lord Kyllachy and a jury on 16th and 17th June. The jury returned a unanimous verdict for the defenders.

On 1st July Salvesen for the defenders moved the Lord Ordinary to apply the verdict, and also moved for decree against Wilkinson senior for expenses incurred down to the date on which Wilkinson junior was sisted as pursuer, and for decree against both quoad ultra. On the question of expenses he (in answer to the Lord Ordinary) cited the undernoted authorities.¹

The pursuers, to whom the motion had been intimated, did not appear.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Applies the verdict found by the jury in this cause, and in respect thereof assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the original pursuer, James Wilkinson senior, liable in expenses up to the date of sisting the present pursuer; and finds both original and present pursuers liable conjunctly and severally in expenses subsequent to that date: Allows an account," &c.

HUTTON & JACK, Solicitors—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

ALEXANDER RUSSELL, Pursuer (Respondent).—John Wilson—Wilton. No. 176.

BANKNOCK COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—

Johnston—C. K. Mackenzie.

July 1, 1897.
Russell v.
Banknock
Coal Co.,
Limited.

Bill of Exchange—Blank Acceptance—Authority to fill in name of third party as drawer—Accommodation Bill—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 61), secs. 20 and 29.—Russell, for the accommodation of Knox, handed to Knox a bill stamp with his (Russell's) acceptance written ¹ Fraser v. Cameron, March 8, 1892, 19 R. 564; White v. Steel, March 10, 1894, 21 R. 649.

No. 176.

July 1, 1897.
 Russell v.
 Banknock
 Coal Co.,
 Limited.

across the face of it, but otherwise blank. It was understood between the parties that a bill on Russell for £189, 13s. at four months should be completed on the acceptance, but there was no agreement that Knox himself should necessarily be the drawer. Knox, for facility of discount, procured the bill to be drawn for the agreed on sum and at the agreed on usance, by the Banknock Company, of which he was managing director, and to whom he was indebted. The company discounted the bill with a bank, and applied the proceeds in reducing a debt due by Knox to them. Knox having become bankrupt, and having failed to retire the bill, it was retired by Russell, who brought an action of relief against the Banknock Company.

Held that the pursuer had no right of recourse against the defenders.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of
 Lanarkshire.

IN November 1896 Alexander Russell, iron and machinery merchant, Coatbridge, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Banknock Coal Company, Limited, for payment of £189, 17s., with interest from 29th October 1896.

The action arose out of a bill of exchange for £189, 13s., drawn by the defenders and bearing the pursuer's acceptance, which had been discounted by the Clydesdale Bank and retired by the pursuer on 29th October 1896, four days after maturity. The pursuer in the present action sought relief of payment of the contents of the bill, together with 4s. as the expense of noting it.

The circumstances, as appearing from the record and a proof, were as follow:—On 23d June 1896 the pursuer and John Knox, coal merchant in Glasgow, and at that date managing director of the defenders' company, agreed to accommodate each other by granting cross bills for £189, 13s. at four months' date. In pursuance of this arrangement they each handed the other a bill stamp sufficient to cover £189, 13s., with the giver's acceptance written across the face of it, but otherwise blank. Knox, instead of completing the bill handed to him by the pursuer by drawing it in his own name, procured the signature of the defenders as drawers, their signature being adhibited by himself as a director of the defenders' company and by Howell the secretary. The parties to the action were at issue as to whether in thus completing the bill otherwise than by drawing it himself, Knox was acting in terms of the arrangement between himself and the pursuer. On this point the pursuer averred;—(Cond. 3) "The pursuer signed the said blank bill stamp on the footing that the bill to be written thereon would be made out as an accommodation bill for the said John Knox, who should sign as drawer, and that the drawer should retire the same at maturity." (Cond. 4) "In direct contravention of said arrangement, and without the knowledge or authority of the pursuer, the said blank stamp was" drawn by the defenders. The evidence of the pursuer and of Knox on this point is given below.*

* Knox deponed,—“I stipulated that I should draw on pursuer for my accommodation, and he should accept that. The arrangement was that I was to retire the bill drawn by me on pursuer, and that he was to retire the bill drawn by him on me. . . . The bills were signed in a tea-room in St Vincent Street. It was merely the acceptors' names that were signed on the bills, otherwise they were left blank. I did not tell pursuer when he handed me the bill stamp signed by him as acceptor that it was my intention to hand the bill stamp blank to the defenders. Pursuer did not authorise me to fill in the defenders as drawers of the bill. (Q.) I think you handed this bill to the defenders blank as regards the drawer's name? (A.) I wanted to get it done in my own bank but could not, and I pre-

The pursuer further averred that the defenders received the proceeds of the bill (less discount). "The defenders gave no value to the said John Knox for the said bill stamp." The defenders in answer averred that the proceeds of the bill were handed by their secretary to Knox, and that Knox thus got the entire benefit of the accommodation. It was proved that Knox at the date of the bill was largely in debt to the defenders, and that the amount of the bill (less discount) was put to his credit with the defenders. Knox became bankrupt and called a meeting of his creditors on 28th October 1896.*

No. 176.

July 1, 1897.
Russell v.
Banknock
Coal Co.,
Limited.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The said bill having been accepted by the pursuer for the accommodation of the drawers, the defenders as drawers thereof are bound to relieve the pursuer of all liability thereunder. (2) The defenders having, without the authority of the pursuer, filled up and signed the bill as drawers, and having thereafter negotiated the same, are liable to relieve the pursuer of liability therefor. (3) The pursuer having paid the said bill to the Clydesdale Bank Limited, the holders thereof, is entitled to reimbursement from the defenders. (4) The defenders not being indorsers of said bill are subject to all objections pleadable against the same in a question with Knox.

vailed upon the secretary of the defenders' company to pass it through the defenders' company. Being managing director of the defenders' company, I signed it as such, so as to get it passed through the bank. . . . The transaction between pursuer and me was a private transaction. I did not do this as the Banknock Coal Company; it had no connection whatever with the company."

The pursuer deponed,—“It was clearly understood that Mr Knox himself was to draw the blank bill accepted by me . . . and that I was to do the same as regards the bill stamp he had signed and handed to me. It was simply for convenience that they were not filled up, because we were in a public place. I never authorised Mr Knox to fill up the bill with any other party as drawer but himself. I would not have done so. He never suggested to me that he proposed to hand away the bill to a third party.”

* The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61) enacts as follows:—Section 20 (1) “Where a simple signature on a blank stamped paper is delivered by the signer in order that it may be converted into a bill, it operates as a prima facie authority to fill it up as a complete bill for any amount the stamp will cover, using the signature for that of the drawer, or the acceptor, or an indorser; and in like manner, when a bill is wanting in any material particular, the person in possession of it has a prima facie authority to fill up the omission in any way he thinks fit.

“(2) In order that any such instrument when completed may be enforceable against any person who became a party thereto prior to its completion, it must be filled up within a reasonable time, and strictly in accordance with the authority given. Reasonable time for this purpose is a question of fact.

“Provided that if any such instrument after completion is negotiated to a holder in due course it shall be valid and effectual for all purposes in his hands, and he may enforce it as if it had been filled up within a reasonable time, and strictly in accordance with the authority given.”

Section 29 (1).—“A holder in due course is a holder who has taken a bill, complete and regular on the face of it, under the following conditions, namely,

“(a) That he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonoured, if such was the fact:

“(b) That he took the bill in good faith and for value, and that at the time the bill was negotiated to him he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it.”

No. 176.

July 1, 1897.
 Russell v.
 Banknock
 Coal Co.,
 Limited.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) Defenders being in the position, as regards pursuer, of holders for value, are not bound to relieve pursuer of liability for said bill, and should be assoilzied, with expenses. (5) Pursuer not having accepted said bill for the accommodation of defenders, they should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 26th March 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) pronounced an interlocutor whereby he, inter alia, found in fact—“(5) That on 23d June 1896, Mr Knox having met the pursuer Russell, it was agreed between them that they should grant each other accommodation to the extent of £189, 13s., by each accepting a bill to that amount, which could be discounted; which was accordingly done, the names of the drawers being left blank; but it was understood between them, if not expressed, that each was to fill up his own name as drawer in the bill which the other accepted,” and then found “on the whole case, and in law (1) that in the circumstances defenders, before they could resist the pursuer’s demand, would have to prove that in inserting their name as drawers they did so under authority from him; (2) that they have failed to prove that they had such authority; (3) that the action is relevant; (4) that in the circumstances pursuer is not barred from insisting on his demand: Repels the pleas in law stated for defenders, and finds defenders liable to pursuer in the sum of £189, 17s., as craved, with interest,” &c.*

* “OPINION.—The points of law at issue in this case are very nice and somewhat doubtful, although there is little variance between parties as to the facts. The law applying to the subject may first be dealt with.

“Before the passing of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the leading authority on the point at issue appears to have been the English case of Schultz v. Astley, 1836, 2 Bingham’s New Cases, 544. In that case, which came up in the Court of Common Pleas before Lord Chief-Justice Tindal and the other Judges, it was stated in the judgment,—‘Nor can we see any distinction in principle, when the bill has passed into the hands of third parties, between holding the acceptor liable to a given amount, when the bill is afterwards drawn in the name of the party who has obtained the acceptance, and when it is drawn by a stranger who becomes the drawer at the instance of the party to whom the acceptance was given. The blank acceptance of the bill is an acceptance of the bill which is afterwards put upon it; and it seems to follow from the doctrine of Lord Mansfield in Russell and Langstaffe that it does not lie in the mouth of the acceptor to say that the drawing or indorsing of the bill is irregular. As all that he (the acceptor) desired was to raise the money, it could make no difference to him, either as to the extent of his liability or in any other respect, whether the bill was drawn in the name of one person or another.’ If therefore the present case fell to be decided by the broad rule laid down in Schultz, it is obvious that the pursuer must fail in his action. It must be noted, however, in view of subsequent law that the pursuer Schultz was not the drawer but an indorsee, who would, in the terms of the recent Bills of Exchange Act, have been held to be a ‘holder in due course,’ and would therefore, had the case occurred even under the recent Act, have been entitled to succeed.

“The pursuer has called attention to two cases that occurred before the Act. The first, Awde v. Dixon, 6 Exch. 869, was the case of a bill delivered over when incomplete in the sum, and on the condition that a third party, Robinson, was to be a joint surety along with the acceptor, and Robinson refused to join. Baron Parke laid down that a party who took such an incomplete instrument could not recover on it unless the person from whom he received it had a real authority to deal with it, or the

The defenders appealed, and argued;—(1) Ante omnia, it was to be borne in mind that this was not an action to enforce a bill of exchange, and consequently the Bills of Exchange Act, sec. 20, which related only to the enforcement of bills of exchange, had no application. The bill had been retired by the acceptor—the pursuer—and the acceptor on a bill, who had retired the bill, had, in virtue of the bill merely, no right of relief against the drawer, since, in retiring the bill, the acceptor had done no more than fulfil the obligation which, ex facie of the bill, he had undertaken to the drawer. The pursuer's case accordingly was not founded on the bill, but on the fact, which was admitted, that the pursuer's acceptance was an accommodation acceptance. Where, however, a bill was retired by the acceptor, the mere fact that the acceptance was an accommodation acceptance was not sufficient to entitle the acceptor to relief against the drawer, since the drawer was not necessarily the person accommodated; and the question whether in any given case the drawer was or was not the person accommodated depended on the real nature of the transaction,

No. 176.

July 1, 1897.
 Russell v.
 Banknock
 Coal Co.,
 Limited.

party granting the note conducted himself in such a manner as to lead the plaintiff to believe that there was authority.

"In the case of Hogarth v. Latham, 1878, L. R., 3 Q. B. D. 643, the pursuer Hogarth received from his partner Cotton two bills with the drawer's name blank accepted in the partnership name of the defenders Latham & Company, of which the partners were Forster and Latham. It afterwards appeared that Forster had accepted them without Latham's authority, which he was not entitled to do. When the plaintiff got the bills he believed that they had been lawfully accepted, but after his suspicions were aroused that there was something wrong, he yet filled in the name of his firm as drawers. The Court assailed. Lord Bramwell held that even 'supposing the plaintiff was entitled to assume that value had passed as between Cotton and defender's firm, yet as the acceptance was in the handwriting of one partner only, the pursuer had not, as against the other partner, and as a matter of right, the power of putting in his name as the drawer, he not being the creditor, and as he did so, he must shew that the partner whose name was not on the bill authorised the other partner to put the document in circulation, and gave authority to any holder to put in his name as drawer. It is one thing to authorise a creditor to put his name to a bill, and another thing to authorise him to insert the name of a third person.'

"Brett, L.J., held that 'the person who takes an acceptance with the drawer's name in blank has no right to say that he may assume that that acceptance entitles any holder to put in any name which he may think fit.' As the drawer 'knew in effect that the defendant had given no authority to draw' at the time when he inserted his name as drawer, his action failed.

"Before the Act of 1882, therefore, it appears, taking the authorities together, that while in the case of a person who would now be termed a 'holder in due course,' a bill in which the drawer's name had thus been subsequently filled up, with or without authority, must prevail—on the other hand, in the hands of one who himself fills in his name as drawer, the document not being a negotiable instrument when he got it, he can only prevail if he can shew that the acceptor, in the words of Lord Bramwell, must be taken to have given authority to anyone into whose hands it might come to fill up the blank. Brett, L. J., says he cannot assume this.

"What, then, is done in this matter by the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882? The 20th section gives power to the possessor of a signature on a bill stamp as a bill, to fill it up as a bill, but that it may be enforceable

No. 176.

July 1, 1897.
 Russell v.
 Banknock
 Coal Co.,
 Limited.

as disclosed by the whole evidence. Now, here it was not suggested by the pursuer that he intended to accommodate the defenders—his case was that he intended to accommodate Knox and nobody else—but if it had been proved that in fact the defenders were the persons accommodated—if they had retained the proceeds of the bill as their own—it would have been difficult for them to resist the pursuer's demand. The evidence, however, clearly shewed that Knox got the accommodation which the pursuer intended he should get. It was true that the defenders drew the bill and discounted it, so that the proceeds in the first instance came into their hands, but it was Knox who got the ultimate benefit. The defenders, in short, had simply given the accommodation of their name to Knox, who thought he could not discount the bill unless it had another name on it than his own, but that was nothing to the point on the question whether the defenders had themselves been accommodated by the pursuer. It was also true that Knox did not put the proceeds of the bill into his own pocket, but applied them pro tanto in diminishing his debt to the defenders. That was no doubt an advantage to the defenders, but it was not accommodation. It was just as if the pursuer had lent Knox so much money, and he had used it to diminish his debt to the defenders. In such a case could it have been against a prior party by him it must be filled up 'strictly in accordance with the authority given,' while, if such an instrument after completion is negotiated to a holder in due course, he may enforce it as if it had been filled up strictly in accordance with the authority given. Practically the Act recognises the doctrine of both Schultz and Hogarth. It gives effect to the right of such a holder as Schultz, whom it denominates a 'holder in due course,' but it imposes on a party who has inserted his own name as drawer in an incomplete instrument the onus of proving authority as in the case of Hogarth.

"Now, in the present case the Clydesdale Bank, who cashed the bill when complete, were holders in due course, and therefore could enforce payment from the pursuer as acceptor. But the defenders, to whom the Clydesdale Bank cashed it, and who had filled in their own name as drawers, must prove authority to do so. This they have failed to do. Neither Knox nor pursuer say that there was any agreement that a third party's name might be inserted as drawer. Each was to draw the bill of which the other was acceptor.

"The defenders contend that the pursuer has lost nothing by the substitution of their name as drawers, that Knox got the money as pursuer intended him to get it, and that in subsequently paying it to them he did no more than he was entitled to do. But then it must be remembered that the Clydesdale Bank paid the money to defenders, not to Knox; it only got to Knox by being handed by them to him, which they did for the purpose of enabling him to pay them a debt which he owed them. They therefore are in the position of the drawers of an inchoate bill, which they themselves completed for their own purposes, and as to which they have failed to prove authority to do so. It is clear, therefore, that they would not have been able to establish liability against the pursuer as acceptor had the question arisen in that form. As it is, the acceptor has paid to a holder in due course, but as the bill was admittedly an accommodation bill, he can recover the amount from the party who got the money from that holder.

"It may seem that it is hard on defenders that they should be found liable when, had Knox filled in his own name as drawer, and indorsed it to the defenders, they would have been safe. This is true. But unfortunately for them the wording of the Bills of Exchange Act is too definite."

suggested that the pursuer had an action for repayment of the loan against the defenders? Therefore, viewing the action in its proper light, as an action for relief on the plea of accommodation, the pursuer's case failed. But (2) even if the question had arisen in an action on the bill, the result would have been the same. Suppose that the defenders had themselves taken up the bill from the bank, and had then brought an action on the bill against the pursuer as acceptor, would it have been an effectual defence to such an action that the acceptance was for accommodation? It certainly would not have been effectual if the defenders—the pursuers of the supposed action—had been bona fide onerous indorsees after completion of the bill, for their position would then have been identical with that of the bank, to whose claim the pursuer admittedly had no answer. It was said, however, that as the defenders had taken a blank acceptance and not a completed bill, any action by them on the bill would be open to the same pleas that were good against Knox. Now, no doubt under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 20, and probably also under the prior law, looking to the authorities founded on by the pursuer,¹ a person getting an acceptance on a bill stamp otherwise blank and completing the bill in his own name as drawer, took the risk of the bill not being completed in accordance with the authority given by the acceptor to the person to whom the acceptance was originally delivered; but the general rule was, both under the Act and at common law,² that a person lawfully in possession of such an acceptance had prima facie authority to draw the bill himself. On this question of authority the proof came to no more than this, that the pursuer and Knox may have assumed in a general sense that each would himself draw on the other's acceptance, but not even the pursuer spoke to this having been an express condition of the agreement. In short, the proof left the question to be determined by the general presumption of law. The bill having thus been well drawn by the defenders, what had the fact that the bill as between the pursuer and Knox was intended for the accommodation of Knox to do with the rights of the defenders as drawers, they having given value for the acceptance and Knox having got the accommodation which the pursuer intended him to get? Their position was exactly that of onerous indorsees after completion of the bill.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defenders had drawn a bill upon an acceptance which they knew to be an accommodation acceptance; they had discounted the bill, and had thus received the accommodation. If they chose to give Knox the benefit of the accommodation, that was their affair; the pursuer having retired the bill was not bound to go beyond the drawers, who had discounted it, for relief. But looking to the substance of the whole transaction it was clear that the defenders had been themselves accommodated. They had in effect borrowed the amount of the bill from the pursuer, and they now declined to repay the loan. It did not alter the substance of the

No. 176.
—
July 1, 1897.
Russell v.
Banknock
Coal Co.,
Limited.

¹ Hood v. Darling, Nov. 25, 1808, Hume's Dec. 59; Awde v. Dixon, 1851, 6 Excheq. 869; Hogarth v. Latham & Co., 1878, L. R., 3 Q. B. D. 643.

² Disher v. Kidd, Nov. 16, 1810, Hume's Dec. 64; Grassick v. Farquharson, July 8, 1846, 8 D. 1073, 18 Scot. Jur. 533; Schulz v. Astley, 1836, 2 Bing. N. C. 544.

No. 176.

July 1, 1897.
 Russell v.
 Banknock
 Coal Co.,
 Limited.

transaction that the defenders and Knox had agreed that his debt to them should be extinguished pro tanto. That merely shewed that the defenders proposed to get payment of part of what Knox owed to them by keeping what the pursuer had lent to them. It was true that Knox might himself have drawn the bill and indorsed it to the defenders in consideration of a discharge of his debt pro tanto. In that case it might be that the defenders, as in a question with the pursuer, would have been in the position of bona fide indorsees for value. As matter of fact, however, the defenders were not indorsees but drawers of the bill, and they must take the consequences of that position. If they had retired the bill they could not have succeeded in an action against the pursuer as acceptor, in the first place, because a person who filled up blanks in a negotiable instrument in his own favour was subject to the same pleas—in this case the plea of accommodation—as the person from whom he received the instrument;¹ and secondly, because the pursuer had never authorised the defenders to draw on him, and had no money or other property of theirs in his possession against which they might be entitled to draw. It was said that by delivering an acceptance blank in the name of the drawer the pursuer had impliedly authorised anyone in lawful possession of the paper to draw on him. The authorities prior to the Bills of Exchange Act were adverse to that view,² and under the Act, section 20, the drawer of a bill could enforce it only if the bill had been drawn up “strictly in accordance with the authority given.” Upon the question whether the pursuer had authorised anyone other than Knox to draw the bill, the Sheriff-substitute had come to the right conclusion on the evidence—that the pursuer had not. In short, as between the pursuer and the defenders there was no bill at all, and the pursuer, therefore, who had been obliged to recognise and retire the bill as in a question with the bank, was entitled to relief from the defenders, through whose unauthorised act the bill had been put into the circle.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think it is necessary to call for any further argument. The original transaction here was of a very simple and common kind. It was arranged between Russell and Knox that Russell should give his acceptance to Knox for his accommodation. He did that by handing to Knox a signature upon a blank bill stamp. That was an authority to Knox to get it filled up as a bill for any amount which the stamp would cover. That has been distinctly decided in the cases which were cited to us, about which there is no dispute, and it is in accordance with practice, and also in accordance with the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Now, what was done with the bill stamp? Knox did not fill in his own name as drawer. Having doubts as to whether the bank would give him the money for the bill, he went to the Banknock Coal Company and asked them to give their name as drawer of the bill. The company consented, and having so consented, they obtained the money and gave Knox credit for it in account with them.

¹ France v. Clark, 1884, L. R., 26 Ch. Div. 257, per Lord Chancellor Selborne, at p. 262.

² Hood v. Darling, Nov. 25, 1808, Hume's Dec. 59; Awde v. Dixon, 1851, 6 Excheq. 869; Hogarth v. Latham & Co., 1878, L. R., 3 Q. B. D. 643; Hanbury v. Lovett, 1868, 18 L. T. R. (N. S.) 366.

They therefore got the bill for value. The result has been that Russell has had to retire the bill. He desires now to make the Banknock Coal Company pay him back what he has had to pay to the bank to meet his acceptance. The grounds on which he makes that claim is that the bill was filled up in a way contrary to the arrangement between him and Knox. That made no difference to him. Being acceptor of the bill, he was bound to pay the amount of the bill in discharge of his acceptance. He has suffered no prejudice. Suppose Knox had drawn the bill himself and then indorsed it to the Banknock Coal Company, who had then discounted it with the bank, the result would have been exactly the same, and Russell would have had to pay just the same. He would have been exactly in the same position as he is now. I am unable to see how, apart from some specialty in the case—and there is no specialty here—the acceptor could have any claim against the drawer in such circumstances as we have in this case.

No. 176.
July 1, 1897.
Russell v.
Banknock
Coal Co.,
Limited.

I should like to guard myself from being supposed to say anything as to what would be the result if there were evidence that the acceptor had made it a condition that the name of the person to whom he was giving accommodation, and the name of no one else, should appear as the drawer of the bill. In that case the result might be different. But in this case there is no evidence to satisfy me that the pursuer made any such stipulation when he gave his signature. It may have been understood by him that Knox would be the drawer of the bill, but that there was any binding arrangement which should prevent him from getting someone else to give his name as drawer appears to me not to be proved in this case.

I do not think the case of *Hood*¹ has any bearing on the present. It is clear from the rubric that there was a specialty in that case which was the ground of the decision. Baron Hume, who was very careful about such matters, would not have used the words "perverted to a wrong purpose" unless there had been some specialty in the case of the kind indicated by these words. That this specialty was the true ground of the decision in that case also appears from the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk in the subsequent case of Grassick.² The case of *Grassick*² is really the same as the present, and I know of no reason why we should not follow it.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and have very little to say. The transaction here was a very plain and simple one. The pursuer signed a piece of paper with a bill stamp for 2s. on it. That piece of paper was therefore capable of being converted into a bill of exchange for any amount which the stamp would cover. He did this for the accommodation of Mr John Knox, Mr John Knox having accommodated him with a similar acceptance. It appears that the sum filled in was £189, 13s., and as to the amount there is no controversy between the parties. The bill was discounted with the Clydesdale Bank, and Knox got the money for it, not directly from the bank, but I take it on the evidence he got it through the Banknock Coal Company. When the bill became due the bank got payment of it from Russell the acceptor. That demand was irresistible, and was not resisted. This action is now brought by him against the Banknock

¹ Hume's Dec. 59.

² 8 D. 1073.

No. 176. Coal Company to recover from them the sum which he paid to the bank in discharge of his obligation as acceptor on the bill. I have been at a loss to understand the ground of such an action. So far as I understand, the only explanation is that the Banknock Coal Company agreed to aid Knox in getting the money from the bank on this bill by becoming drawers of it. The effect of that was only to facilitate the discounting of the bill. They got the money and gave Knox credit for it in account with them. What, then, is the ground of Russell's claim against them? The first plea in law is,—“The said bill having been accepted by the pursuer for the accommodation of the drawers, the defenders as drawers thereof are bound to relieve the pursuer of all liability thereunder.” That is absolute nonsense. The bill was accepted for the accommodation of Knox, not for the accommodation of the Banknock Coal Company, and Knox was accommodated. To say that because the Banknock Coal Company aided him to get the money for the bill by becoming drawers of the bill they were accommodated is absurd. Then the second plea in law is,—“The defenders having, without the authority of the pursuer, filled up and signed the said bill as drawers, and having thereafter negotiated the same, are liable to relieve the pursuer of liability therefor.” I think that is equally unsound and untenable. Under the statute, and irrespective of the statute, any person who comes to be honestly in possession of a blank bill with a bill stamp on it and a signature is entitled to fill up the bill in any way he pleases, provided he does not make it for a larger sum than the stamp will cover. Of course, this does not apply to a thief or a finder of such a piece of paper. He is not in honest possession. But the Coal Company were, and if they were they were entitled to fill up the bill by signing it themselves as drawers. If it could be shewn that the pursuer was prejudiced by what the Coal Company did it might be different. If he had suffered prejudice, he might get something by way of damages from the defenders for having done something to his prejudice. But there is no suggestion of prejudice to the pursuer. If Knox had signed the bill himself as drawer, and indorsed it to the Banknock Coal Company, who had discounted it with the bank, the pursuer's liability would have been exactly the same—that is to say, to discharge his obligation as acceptor. Why he is to have relief from the Banknock Coal Company because he has fulfilled his obligation on the bill, I confess I cannot understand. This is an action against the Banknock Coal Company, and it must be based upon some intelligible ground. The pursuer is not suing them on the bill except as drawers of the bill which he has accepted; there is no relation between them and him at all. I am therefore of opinion that with appropriate findings in fact, which in this case we are bound to make, we must find in law that the pursuer has no legal ground for a claim against the defenders, and assolvie them from the conclusions of the action.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I have not heard any ground stated which would entitle the pursuer, in my opinion, to our judgment. If the present defenders had been suing the pursuer upon the bill in question, I could have understood the argument—I do not say I could have assented to it—that he was not liable in respect of the alleged irregularity in the constitution of the bill. But that is not the case or kind of case we have before us.

The pursuer is suing the defenders for repetition of a sum which he paid in respect of his own obligation to his own creditor. The pursuer was the primary obligant on the bill; he was the acceptor. He accepted the bill for the purpose of enabling his friend to raise money on his, the pursuer's, obligation by discounting the bill. The bill was in the hands of the bank, who discounted it, and the pursuer paid the bank as he was bound to do when the bill matured. In doing so he was, I repeat, paying his own debt to his own creditor. Why should the defenders be called upon to reimburse him? I think the claim for repetition out of the question. If the pursuer could have shewn that the interposition of the Banknock Company as drawers instead of Knox had prejudiced him, perhaps a claim of damages might have arisen. But the pursuer has plainly suffered no prejudice. He has not been called upon to do anything more than fulfil the obligation which he voluntarily undertook on behalf of Knox.

No. 176.
July 1, 1897.
Russell v.
Banknock
Coal Co.,
Limited.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. Prima facie delivery to Knox of the bill stamp, signed by the pursuer as acceptor, authorised Knox to get the bill filled up with any name he chose as drawer. This is in accordance with the cases of *Disher*¹ and Grassick,² and also with the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. It is not necessary to consider what would have been the result if there had been an express stipulation that Knox should fill up the bill with his own name as drawer, because in my opinion such a stipulation is not proved. It is not enough to prove that authority was not expressly given by Russell to Knox to get the bill filled up with someone else's name as drawer. It was necessary to shew that when Russell gave his acceptance it was made a condition, express or necessarily implied, that Knox alone should sign as drawer. Now, the proof does not come up to this. The Sheriff-substitute's judgment is based upon a finding that it was understood between them (that is, Russell and Knox), if not expressed, that each was to fill up his own name as drawer on the bills. In one sense this may be true, but the understanding, such as it was, is not shewn to have amounted to a condition. I think the interlocutor is erroneous, and should be recalled.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact (1) that on 23d June 1896 John Knox, coal-merchant, Glasgow, met the pursuer in Glasgow, when it was agreed between them that they should grant each other accommodation by way of cross bills; (2) that accordingly each handed to the other a blank acceptance to be filled up for the sum of £189, 13s. at four months' date; (3) that though it was in the contemplation of the parties that each should become drawer of the bill to be accepted by the other, there is no evidence that there was any agreement come to which precluded the bill, so handed to the said John Knox, being filled up with another name as drawer than his own; (4) that accordingly the pursuer wrote across a paper bearing a stamp, which would cover the sum of £189, 13s., his acceptance payable at

¹ Hume's Dec. 64.

² 8 D. 1073.

No. 176.

July 1, 1897.
Russell v.
Banknock
Coal Co.,
Limited.

the Bank of Scotland, Hope Street branch, Glasgow, and handed it to the said John Knox; (5) that the said John Knox, for facility in discount, procured the bill, accepted by pursuer and handed to him, to be filled in with the agreed on sum, and at the agreed on usance, but with the name of the defenders' company as drawers, the drawers' subscription being adhibited by himself as a director and by Jonathan Howell, the secretary of the defenders' company; (6) that the bill so completed and indorsed was discounted by the defenders with the Clydesdale Bank, and the proceeds, less discount, applied to the uses of the said John Knox; (7) that the said John Knox having become bankrupt failed to retire the bill when it fell due on 26th October 1896, and called a meeting of his creditors on 29th October 1896, on which day the pursuer retired the bill: Find in law that the pursuer has in these circumstances no claim to recover from the defenders the sum which he has paid to the Clydesdale Bank as onerous indorsees of the bill: Therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and find them entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court, and remit," &c.

GRAY & HANDYSIDE, S.S.C.—R. AINSLIE BROWN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 177.

July 2, 1897.
Chalmers v.
Paterson.

DAVID CHALMERS, Pursuer (Appellant).—Salvesen—W. Brown.
PETER R. PATERSON, Defender (Respondent).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson— Abel.

Sale—Sale of moveables—Right of inspection before taking delivery.—Certain barrels of herrings were, after an inspection by the buyer, bought for shipment abroad, it being part of the contract that delivery should not take place until the buyer had arranged for a ship, and that the seller should until delivery attend regularly to the condition of the herrings, in order to ascertain whether any of the barrels had lost their "pickle" by leakage, and should supply fresh pickle in that event. About a month afterwards, the buyer intimated that he had a ship ready, but refused to take delivery of the herrings except at a reduced price, on the ground that they were not of the quality represented in the contract. The seller having declined to agree to this, the buyer made a formal demand to inspect the herrings as to "quality and cure." The seller refused this demand, and the buyer thereupon refused to take delivery.

In an action by the seller for the price, held that, while the defender, having inspected the herrings before purchasing, would not have been entitled to a second inspection with the view of ascertaining whether they were of the quality specified in the contract, his right to inspect them before taking delivery for the purpose of identifying them as in fact the herrings purchased by him and for the purpose of ascertaining whether their pickling had been properly attended to, was absolute; that the pursuer was not entitled to refuse the defender's demand for an inspection on the ground that the defender intended to use the inspection for an illegitimate purpose; that the pursuer therefore was in breach of contract; and that the defender fell to be assoilzied.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.

ON 19th September 1895 David Chalmers, fish-curer, Findochty, sold to Peter R. Paterson, coal-merchant and fish-curer, Fraserburgh, several lots of herrings, including 244 barrels of unbranded matties, at 17s. a barrel.

The contract note bore,—“To be delivered in good condition, clean No. 177. and well pickled, f.o.b. on buyer's order.”

Paterson purchased the herrings through his buyer, George Forbes, ^{July 2, 1897.} who had been told before purchasing to satisfy himself as to the ^{Chalmers v. Paterson.} quality of the herrings, and had done so.

The herrings were purchased for export to Riga, and under the contract between Chalmers and Paterson delivery was not to be taken immediately, but only when Paterson could arrange for a steamer in which to export them. In the meantime, until delivery, the herrings remained in Chalmers' premises in Aberdeen, and under the contract it was his duty, until delivery, to see that the herrings were regularly attended to in order to ascertain that none of the barrels lost their pickle through leakage or otherwise.

Barrels of herring are apt to lose their pickle, and when this occurred it was necessary that the barrel should at once be filled up with fresh pickle, otherwise the herrings in it would become dry and what was known as “rusty,” and would not be in good condition. An expert merely by tapping a barrel could ascertain whether it was at the moment properly supplied with pickle, but without opening the barrel and inspecting the herrings themselves he could not ascertain whether it had always been kept properly supplied.

On 26th October Forbes, Paterson's buyer, on Paterson's instructions, came to Aberdeen to arrange for the shipment of the herrings, and on that day made an examination of certain of the barrels of herrings, which were lying outside in the yard of Chalmers' premises. As the result of this examination Forbes sent this telegram to Paterson (the portions here omitted referred to another parcel of herrings):—

“Have examined . . . Chalmers' herrings . . . fair pars, but good many smalles herrings in them . . . must reduce . . . 1s. 6d.”

In consequence of this telegram Paterson, on the same day, sent the following telegram to Chalmers:—“My shipper, inspecting your selected matties, finds great many only smalls; refuse take delivery unless reduction 2s. brl.; wire instantly, vessel ready Monday.”

Chalmers, in reply, on 28th October, telegraphed to Paterson,—“Only received your Saturday telegram about shipment herrings now. The matties were inspected already, and are perfectly up to sample. Will be Aberdeen one o'clock.”

Chalmers came to Aberdeen on 30th October, and there met Paterson, who demanded to be allowed to inspect the herrings. Chalmers refused on the ground that Paterson had already, through his buyer Forbes, made an inspection, and was not entitled to a second inspection. Paterson thereupon wrote the following letter, and handed it to Chalmers:—“Dear Sir,—With reference to my call at your fish-curing premises to-day for the purpose of inspecting before shipment the unbranded matties bought by me from you, and your refusal to allow me to so inspect, I hereby give you notice that I will wait at your yard for permission to inspect. Failing your granting me permission by 4 P.M. to-night of ascertaining by inspection whether the goods are of the requisite quality and cure, I will hold you refuse to implement the sale, and hold you responsible for freight and other loss. You are at liberty to appoint a party to represent you at the inspection.”

Chalmers having returned no answer to this letter, Paterson refused to take delivery of the herrings.

No. 177.

July 2, 1897.
Chalmers v.
Paterson.

Chalmers then brought an action for the price in the Sheriff Court at Peterhead.

The parties were at issue upon the question whether, by custom of trade, the defender, notwithstanding his inspection through his buyer Forbes at the time of purchase, was entitled, before taking delivery, to a second inspection with the view of satisfying himself as to whether the herrings were in every respect conform to the description in the contract, and of rejecting them if, upon any ground, they were not; but the case ultimately came to turn upon the following issue, which proceeded on the assumption that the defender had no such general right of inspection and rejection:—The pursuer, while not seriously disputing that he would have been bound to allow the defender to inspect before taking delivery if he had asked for the inspection for the purpose of identifying the herrings as those bought by him, or for the purpose of ascertaining whether the pursuer had fulfilled his obligation to keep the herrings properly pickled, maintained that he was not bound to allow the inspection actually demanded, seeing that it was plain from the correspondence that the defender asked for the inspection in order that he might reject the herrings if they were in any respect disconform to the description in the contract. The defender, on the other hand, maintained that his right to inspect before delivery for identification and as to pickling was absolute, whatever his other motives might have been, and that the pursuer, by refusing to allow him to inspect, was in breach of contract.

A proof was allowed. The evidence, in the opinion of the Court, established the facts narrated above in so far as they had been in dispute.

On 6th February 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact in conformity with the foregoing narrative):—"Finds in law (1) that the herrings having been inspected at the time of purchase defender was not entitled to a second inspection for the purpose of ascertaining their quality; but (2) that the herrings not having been taken delivery of at the time of purchase, defender was in terms of his contract entitled to ascertain by inspection if necessary whether the herrings were in good condition, clean, and well pickled at the time of delivery; and (3) . . . that pursuer having refused to allow defender to inspect the herrings when permission was requested to do so on 30th October, defender was not bound to take delivery; therefore assoilzies defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns," &c.

On appeal the Sheriff (Crawford), on 27th March, adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—It was plain from the telegrams of 26th October and the defender's letter of 30th October that his object, and his only object, in asking for an inspection on 30th October was that he might reject the herrings if they did not in any respect conform to the description in the contract. It might be conceded that he was entitled to inspect before delivery for the purpose of identifying the herrings as being in fact the herrings that he had purchased, or for the purpose of seeing whether they had been kept properly pickled, and if he had simply asked to be allowed to inspect without saying why, the pursuer would probably have put himself in the wrong if he had refused. But the pursuer knew what the defender's object was, and if, with that knowledge, he had allowed the inspection, it might well have been held that he was barred from afterwards objecting to the defender rejecting the herrings as disconform to contract. In short the pursuer would not have been entitled to refuse an inspection if he had been appealed to as custodier of the herrings, but he was entitled to refuse as he had been appealed to as seller. No. 177.

July 2, 1897.
Chalmers v.
Paterson.

Argued for the defender;—It was clear that the defender was entitled to inspect the herrings with the view of seeing whether they were the herrings he had bought. A buyer was not bound to take anything the seller chose to tender as in implement of the contract.¹ The defender was also entitled to inspect the herrings for the purpose of seeing whether the pursuer had attended properly to their pickling. This was a fortiori in the case of goods intended to be shipped abroad immediately on delivery, for it would be too late to reject on either of these grounds after the goods had gone abroad,² and it was unreasonable to suppose that the defender should open the barrels and inspect the herrings at the ship's side, or anywhere else than in the pursuer's premises. But the pursuer had in effect conceded the defender's right to inspect for either of the purposes mentioned. His case really was that he was entitled to refuse the inspection because the defender's declared object in asking for it was to raise the whole question of conformity or disconformity to contract. Now, in the first place, it was not clear that the defender did declare this to be his object—at least his sole object. In his formal letter of demand of 30th October he asked for an inspection as to "quality and cure"—language which might well include, if it was not confined exclusively to, the pickling of the herrings. But even if the defender had unequivocally demanded an inspection for the purpose of raising the general question of conformity to contract, that did not entitle the pursuer to refuse the inspection. His proper course would have been to reply, "Inspect as much as you like, only you are not entitled to reject unless the herrings are not in fact the herrings you bought, or unless their pickling has not been attended to properly." Had he taken that course he would have been in perfect safety as regarded any plea of personal bar. In refusing the demand for an inspection the pursuer had violated an essential condition of the contract, which entitled the defender to rescind.³

Junior counsel were heard on the question whether under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the property in the herrings had passed before delivery, but senior counsel stated that they did not consider that the question between the parties turned in any way on that point.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the Sheriffs are right. The defender purchased the herrings in question after inspection by his buyer. He could not thereafter object to the quality of what he had bought, or claim any deduction from the contract price, on the ground that they were not unbranded matties, or not so good as he or his buyer had thought they were. But the matties so bought were packed in barrels, which were in no way marked or

¹ Isherwood v. Whitmore, 1843, 11 M. and W. 347; Benjamin on Sale (4th ed.), p. 704; Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 34 (2).

² Morton & Co. v. Abercromby, Jan. 7, 1858, 20 D. 362, 30 Scot. Jur. 193; Cowdenbeath Coal Co., Limited, v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, June 15, 1895, 22 R. 682; Pini & Co. v. Smith & Co., June 19, 1895, 22 R. 699.

³ Turnbull v. Maclean & Co., March 5, 1874, 1 R. 730.

No. 177.

July 2, 1897.
Chalmers v.
Paterson.

identified; they were to be kept by the pursuer until the defender gave orders for their delivery, and the pursuer contracted to deliver them then in good order. In the meantime they were to be cared for by the pursuer, especially in the matter of seeing as to their being preserved in good and sufficient pickle. In these circumstances the defender was entitled, before taking delivery, to inspect the matties, first, to satisfy himself that the matties tendered to him in fulfilment of the contract were the matties he had bought, and second, to see that the pursuer had kept them as he was bound to do, and was delivering them in good order, clean and well pickled in terms of his contract. Such an inspection could not be made at the ship's side, and the defender's demand to inspect the matties in the pursuer's yard was not only within his right, but was most reasonable in itself. I am of opinion that the defender was not bound to take, without inspection, whatever the pursuer pleased to represent as the defender's matties; and that the pursuer's refusal to allow the matties to be inspected entitled the defender to act as he did.

In the course of the discussion, a reference was made to the Sale of Goods Act, but as senior counsel for both parties concurred in stating that the provisions of that Act did not affect the question here raised, I have not taken the Sale of Goods Act into consideration in disposing of the case.

LORD LOW.—I agree in the judgment which has just been delivered, that the interlocutor of the Sheriff should be affirmed, and I concur in the grounds of judgment which Lord Trayner has stated.

At the same time I think that the dispute has probably arisen out of the position which at one time the defender took up. The telegrams of 26th October passing between Forbes and the defender, and the defender and the pursuer, shew that at that date the defender took up the position that the matties were not of the quality which they had been represented to be, and that he refused to take delivery unless a substantial reduction was made in the price. As the matties had been bought after inspection by the defender's buyer, that was clearly a position which he was not entitled to take up.

Now, it may be that the pursuer believed, and had reason to believe, that the inspection which the defender asked in his letter of 30th October, was for the purpose of ascertaining whether there were not, as reported to him by Forbes, a number of small herrings in the barrels, with the intention, if that turned out to be the case, of refusing to take delivery except at a reduced price, and I think that it is not improbable that that was the defender's intention. But I think that the defender's right to an inspection for the purposes stated by Lord Trayner was absolute, and the suspicion that the defender intended to use the inspection for an illegitimate purpose did not justify the pursuer in insisting that he should take delivery without any inspection. Therefore, although I cannot free the defender from blame, I think that the pursuer has in the end put himself entirely in the wrong, and that judgment must go against him.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with both your Lordships. I think there is a great deal in what Lord Low has said with regard to the defender's conduct. But his right to inspect the herrings before shipment, first, for the purpose of seeing that the herrings proposed to be delivered were the herrings which he had bought; and second, for the purpose of seeing that they were in good condition, and had been kept well pickled, was absolute, and the pursuer was not entitled to refuse him an opportunity of exercising it. No. 177.

July 2, 1897.
Chalmers v.
Paterson.

LORD YOUNG and LORD MONCREIFF were absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal: Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and law in the interlocutors appealed against: Assoilzie the defenders, and decern," &c.

ALEXANDER ROSS, S.S.C.—WM. CROFT GRAY, Solicitor—Agents.

MRS SARAH THOMSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Guy—Findlay.
LANARKSHIRE AND DUMBARTONSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Malcolm.

No. 178.

July 3, 1897.
Thomson v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

Reparation—Precautions for safety of the public—Safety of children—Wall separating public place from railway.—In an action against a railway company for damages on account of the death of a son, the pursuer averred that the defenders' line of railway, in passing through a town, was separated from a public court by a wall belonging to the defenders about five feet high on the side facing the court, with a drop about twenty-five feet in depth on the railway side; that this wall was flat on the top, and about fourteen inches wide; that the pursuer's son, who was a boy ten years of age, was playing in the court, and, following the example of his companions, got on to the top of the wall by means of a heap of rubbish, two feet high, which had been left by the defenders against the wall in the court; that the boy, while walking along the top of the wall, stumbled and fell down on to the railway and was killed; and that the accident was due to the negligence of the defenders in not having a fence or other obstruction to prevent children from getting on to the top of the wall, and also in placing the heap of rubbish against the wall. Held that the action was irrelevant.

IN January 1897 Mrs Sarah Boyd or Thomson, widow, residing at 28 Kelvin Street, Partick, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company for £500 as damages on account of the death of her son, Thomas Thomson. 2ND DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) The defenders' railway, as it passed through Partick, below the level of the street, was "bounded by a wall belonging to the defenders, which runs alongside of and separates from the railway the public court of" a tenement of houses. "The said wall on the side facing the public court is about 4 feet 11 inches in height, and on the railway side is about 25 feet in depth. The said wall is flat on the top, and about 14 inches wide." (Cond. 4) That in this court "there was at the date of the accident after mentioned, a heap of dirt of about 2 feet or thereby high, which had been left there by the defenders or their workmen. Easy access to the top of the railway wall could be had by this heap." (Cond. 5) "The said railway wall was, on account of its broad flat top and the easy access to it, and the great depth on the railway side, dangerous to children. Explained that the defenders intended to protect the wall by a railing on the top, but they negligently left the wall in an incomplete and unsafe condition by failure on their part to place a railing or other obstruction along the top thereof. This was or ought to have been known to the defenders; but they failed to put a railing or other preventive obstruction on the top of it. The defenders failed to take

No. 178.

July 3, 1897.
Thomson v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

ordinary and reasonable precautions to prevent young children from getting on to the top of the wall." (Cond. 6) "On 9th August 1896 the pursuer's son, Thomas Thomson, ten years of age, was playing in the said public court, and, following the example of his playmates, he got on to the flat top of said railway wall by the said heap of rubbish, and while walking along it stumbled and fell on to the railway, a depth of 25 feet, and was killed." (Cond. 8) "The said accident was due to the negligence of the defenders in leaving said railway wall in an incomplete and unsafe condition, and in not having a railing or some other obstruction on the top of said wall, so as to prevent children from getting on to the top of same, and also through the negligence of defenders in having placed the heap of rubbish as aforesaid."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's child having been killed through the fault and negligence of the defenders, as condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to reparation from them.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of her action.

On 6th February 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) allowed a proof before answer.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry), on 15th April 1897, recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, sustained the defenders' plea of irrelevancy, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—She had stated a case entitling her to go to a jury on the question whether the defenders were in fault in not fencing this dangerous place in a populous locality, and further, in adding to the danger by permitting this heap of rubbish to remain.¹

The defenders were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In my opinion there is no relevant case set forth on this record. It is said that this wall fenced off a public place from the defenders' line of railway, and that it was about five feet in height. It is also averred that there was a pile of rubbish two feet high placed against the wall by the defenders, but that left three feet of wall above the pile of rubbish. A boy ten years of age must have known perfectly that a wall like this was an obstruction which he had no business to pass, and in this case he was not going to pass it. He was not going there for any legitimate purpose; he went on to the wall in order to amuse himself by walking on the top of it, and it was while walking along the top of it that he lost his balance and fell over. It seems to me that this is a case which cannot be held relevant.

LORD YOUNG, LORD TRAYNER, and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the Sheriff's interlocutor.

HENRY ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 179.

July 3, 1897.
Murray v.
Rennie &
Angus.

MRS ELLEN CARR OR MURRAY, Pursuer (Appellant).—Abel.

RENNIE & ANGUS, Defenders (Respondents).—Salvesen.

Expenses—Sheriff—Action ad factum præstandum and for damages—Conclusion ad factum præstandum dropped—Act of Sederunt, 4th December 1878—General Regulations 1, 3, and 4.—Section 1 of the General

¹ Findlay v. Angus, Jan. 14, 1887, 14 R. 312.

Regulations annexed to the Act of Sederunt of 4th December 1878 provides that "in the ordinary Sheriff Court there shall be two scales of taxation, viz.,—First, for causes where the amount of principal and past interest concluded for does not exceed £25; second, for causes of higher amount." No. 179.
July 3, 1897.
Murray v.
Rennie &
Angus.

Subsection 3 of section 3 provides that "in damage cases the scale for taxation of the account between party and party shall for the pursuer's agent be regulated by the amount decerned for, unless the Sheriff shall otherwise direct."

In an action raised in a Sheriff Court for implement of a contract and for damages, the Sheriff-substitute, on the joint application of the parties before the record was closed, authorised the pursuer to accept another tender for the contract. The pursuer ultimately obtained decree in the Court of Session for payment of £11, 10s. of damages, with expenses.

Held that the action having at the outset been converted into a mere action for damages, the Auditor was bound to tax the pursuer's expenses in the Sheriff Court on the lower scale, no direction having been given to the contrary.

Opinions that, if it was desired to have the higher scale applied, a motion to that effect should have been made when judgment in the case was given.

(SUPRA, p. 965.)

Mrs Ellen Murray raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Rennie & Angus, masons, to have them ordained to execute certain mason work according to a contract which they had made with the pursuer, and to pay a sum of £25, and, failing their immediately commencing the work and completing it within such period as the Court might appoint, to pay £50 as damages.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.

Before the closing of the record the parties presented a joint minute in which they concurred in craving the Court to authorise the pursuer to accept the next offer to that made by the defenders, or to take new offers, and the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) interposed authority to this minute, and authorised the pursuer as craved.

On 4th January 1897 the Sheriff-substitute assoilzied the defenders, and on appeal the Sheriff (Crawford) affirmed his interlocutor.

The pursuer having appealed to the First Division, the Court, on 18th June (vide supra, p. 971), recalled the interlocutors appealed against, and granted decree in favour of the pursuer for the sum of £11, 10s., with expenses in both Courts.

Upon the Auditor's report coming up for approval, the defenders objected thereto on the ground that the Auditor should have taxed the expenses in the Sheriff Court upon the lower instead of the higher scale as he had done. They founded upon the General Regulations made by the Act of Sederunt of 4th December 1878,* and in parti-

* By the Act of Sederunt of 4th December 1878, the Lords of Council and Session enacted that the Regulations and Table of Fees annexed thereto should, after 31st December 1878, regulate the fees of agents practising before the Sheriff Courts until the same should be altered by the Court. Annexed to the Act are, inter alia, the following General Regulations:—I. "In the ordinary Sheriff Court there shall be two scales of taxation, viz.,—First, for causes when the amount of principal and past interest concluded for does not exceed £25; second, for causes of higher amount. In executory proceedings there shall be one scale of taxation only. . . .

"III. (1) The scale for taxation shall in the ordinary case be determined by the amount concluded for, but in all cases it shall be competent to the Sheriff to direct that the expenses shall be taxed according to the scale applicable to the amount decerned for. (2) In cases where the sum concluded for does not exceed £25, it shall be competent to the Sheriff to direct

No. 179.

July 3, 1897.
Murray v.
Rennie &
Angus.

cular subsection (3) of section 3 thereof, and argued;—By the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute interponing authority to the joint minute of parties the action had been converted into a mere action for damages before the record was closed. Section 4 had therefore no application, and the account should have been taxed on the lower scale, the amount decerned for being under £25, and the Court having made no direction to the contrary. If the pursuer desired the higher scale to apply it was for him to move the Court to that effect.

Argued for the pursuer;—The action was one ad factum præstandum, and section 4 applied. In the absence of direction from the Court, the Auditor was entitled to tax on the higher scale. If the defenders wished the lower scale to apply, they should have made a motion to that effect when the case was decided.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think Mr Salvesen is right. The summons did contain a conclusion for implement, but at the very outset, as appears from the joint minute of parties and the interlocutor of the Sheriff, the action was converted into an action of damages pure and simple, and so the section of the Act of Sederunt founded on by Mr Salvesen appears to be applicable, no motion having been made in the Sheriff Court, or here, to have the higher scale applied.

LORD ADAM.—I agree. I think that, if it was desired to have the higher scale applied, the matter should been brought up at the time the action was disposed of. It is not a question of taxation.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. If there had been a real question argued under the conclusions for implement, I should have held that the higher scale ought to be applied. But there was no such question argued here.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite agree, and I entirely concur with what Lord Adam has said, that this is a question which ought to be raised at the time when judgment is given, because it is not a question of pure taxation, but a question for the Court as to the construction of the Act of Sederunt and its application to this particular case. But that being so, the question comes to be, under which section of the Act of Sederunt the case falls. And I agree with your Lordship that this is to all intents and purposes an action of damages.

THE COURT sustained the objection, and remitted the account back to the Auditor to tax the same according to Scale I. of the Sheriff Court Table of Fees, and to report.

RONALD & BITCHIE, S.S.C.—PHILIP, LAING, & HARLEY, W.S.—Agents.

taxation on the higher scale, if he shall be of opinion that the amount sued for does not truly indicate the nature and importance of the cause. (3) In damage cases, the scale of taxation of the account between party and party shall, for the pursuer's agent, be regulated by the sum decerned for, unless the Sheriff shall otherwise direct. . . .

"IV. . . . In actions ad factum præstandum, for exoneration, interdict, and others, where the pecuniary amount or value of the question in dispute cannot be ascertained from the process, the Sheriff, when deciding the case, shall determine according to which scale the amount shall be taxed."

DAME FLORENCE WINIFRED BERENS OR ROSS, Pursuer (Respondent).— No. 180.
W. Campbell.

SIR CHARLES HENRY AUGUSTUS FREDERICK LOCKHART ROSS, Defender July 3, 1897.
ROSS v. ROSS.
 (Reclaiming).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Pitman.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Competency—Action of Divorce.—Held that it was competent for the defender in an action of divorce for adultery, who had appeared by counsel, but had not lodged defences or contested the case on the merits, to reclaim against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary granting decree of divorce.

Opinion by Lord McLaren and Lord Kinnear, that it is competent for the defender in an action of divorce to reclaim against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary granting decree of divorce, although he has made no appearance in the Outer-House.

IN October 1896 Lady Ross, wife of Sir Charles Ross of Balnakeil, 1st Division, gown, raised an action of divorce on the ground of adultery against her husband.

No defences were lodged, and on 31st October the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) found the libel relevant, and appointed proof to be led on 11th December.

On 8th December Sir Charles Ross raised a counter action of divorce against his wife, and on 9th December the Lord Ordinary, in respect of the service of this counter action, discharged the diet of proof fixed for 11th December.

On 17th March 1897 proof was led in the action by Lady Ross. Sir Charles was represented by counsel at the proof, but they did not cross-examine the pursuer's witnesses, or contest the case on the merits. At the close of the proof they moved the Lord Ordinary to postpone granting decree until proof had been led in the counter action. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor finding the defender guilty of adultery, but, quoad ultra, in respect of the dependence of the counter action, superseded further consideration of the cause until the counter action was ripe for judgment.

On 12th June, after proof had been led in the counter action, the Lord Ordinary pronounced decree of divorce against Sir Charles Ross, and in the counter action assoilzied Lady Ross.

Sir Charles reclaimed in both actions.

Lady Ross objected to the competency of the reclaiming notes, and argued;—(1) The reclaiming note in the first action was incompetent, because Sir Charles had lodged no defences, and had not opposed decree being granted. The decree was therefore a decree in absence, and the defender's proper remedy would have been to apply for its recall within ten days.¹ As he had not done so the decree had become final. (2) Assuming the decree to have been pronounced in foro the defender could not reclaim against it, as he had not resisted its being granted, and indeed it was admitted that the reclaiming note was not presented for the purpose of opening up the case on the merits. (3) If the reclaiming note in the first action was incompetent and the Lord Ordinary's decree final the counter action fell to the ground, the parties being no longer man and wife.

Argued for the reclaiming;—Every decree in an action for divorce was a decree in foro, and the defender could appear at any stage of ¹ Section 23 of Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100).

No. 180. the case.¹ Section 23 of the Act of 1868 accordingly did not apply. Further, the defender had appeared at critical periods of the case.

July 3, 1897.
Ross v. Ross.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think there is no doubt that this reclaiming note is competent. Upon the proceedings it appears that Sir Charles Ross was represented by counsel at what I may call the two most critical stages of the case. And accordingly I have heard nothing to shew that he is not entitled to follow the action forward by carrying on the appeal here.

I by no means imply, by my reference to the proceedings in the Outer-House, that the reclaiming note would have been incompetent if Sir Charles had stayed away.

LORD ADAM.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. I agree in the observation made by your Lordship in the course of the argument, that if the defender in a consistorial case appears by counsel at any stage that is an appearance for all purposes, and that the mere circumstance that he has not thought it consistent with the requirements of the case to contest it on the merits does not prevent the appearance being an appearance on the merits. If it were necessary to consider the point my leaning would be to go further, and hold that, although the defender had not appeared by counsel or in person in the Outer-House, he was not thereby barred from presenting a reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's judgment, because he may change his mind, and the decision is not final until the expiry of the reclaiming days.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have no doubt as to the competency of the reclaiming note. I think a defender in an action of divorce may appear at any time, though he has not put in defences.

THE COURT sent the reclaiming notes to the roll.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 181.

July 3, 1897.
Paolo v.
Parias.

PASQUALE DI PAOLO, Pursuer (Appellant).—Wilson.
PHILIP PARIAS, Defender (Respondent).—Forsyth.

Expenses—Decree in name of Agent-disburser—Compensation.—A, having been found liable to B in the expenses of an appeal to the Court of Session in an action which he had raised in the Sheriff Court against B, objected to decree going out in the name of the agent-disburser, on the ground that in a prior action with B, relating to the same matter, and tried in the same Sheriff Court, which was pending when the second action was brought, he had obtained decree for expenses against B which had not been paid, and which he maintained should be set off against the expenses in which he had been found liable. The decree in the prior action had been granted and extracted before the appeal in the second action came into Court.

Held that the agent-disburser in the appeal was entitled to decree for expenses in his own name, in respect that at the date of the appeal the prior action was no longer pending.

Portobello Pier Co. v. Clift, 4 R. 685, distinguished.

¹ Paterson v. Paterson, June 8, 1848, 20 Scot. Jur. 459; Cumming, March 16, 1875, vide Coldstream on the Practice of the Court of Session, p. 152.

PHILIP PARIAS raised an action against Pasquale di Paolo in the Sheriff Court at Clackmannan for payment of £30, as the balance due of the price of an ice-cream business belonging to the pursuer which it was alleged the defender had agreed to purchase. No. 181.

July 3, 1897.
Paolo v.
Parias.

In defence it was alleged that the pursuer had failed to implement a material part of the contract between the parties, and that the defender was therefore entitled to refuse to implement the obligation which the contract imposed upon him.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

On 17th January 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Johnstone) assolized the defender, and his judgment was acquiesced in.

On 1st April decree for expenses was pronounced against Parias. On 20th April this decree was extracted, and on 24th April Parias was charged thereon. The expenses were not paid.

In March 1896 Paolo raised an action in the same Court against Parias for interdict against his carrying on the business of an ice-cream merchant within a radius of ten miles of Alva.

The pursuer founded upon the agreement which he had repudiated as defender in the previous action.

On 20th April 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Liddell) found that the contract founded on by the pursuer had been discharged in virtue of the judgment in the prior action, and refused interdict.

On 2d June 1896, after certain procedure, the Sheriff (Lees) affirmed the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and on 8th July the Sheriff-substitute (Johnstone) approved of the auditor's report upon the defender's account of expenses, and allowed decree for said expenses to go out and to be extracted in name of a solicitor at Alva as agent-disburser.

The pursuer subsequently appealed to the First Division, and on 15th January 1897 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the appeal; affirm the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff, dated 20th April and 2d June 1896 respectively, and decern: Find the pursuer (appellant) liable to the defender in the expenses of the appeal, and remit the account to the Auditor to tax and report."

Upon the Auditor's report on the defender's account of expenses coming up for approval, counsel moved for decree in name of the agent-disburser.

The pursuer objected, and maintained that the expenses to which he had been found entitled in the prior action should be set off against the expenses of the appeal in the second action in which he had been found liable. He argued that as the two actions were between the same parties and relative to the same matter of dispute, and as the first was still pending when the second was raised, the principle of compensation was applicable.¹

The defender argued that, as the second action had not been raised until after judgment had been given in the first, the two actions could not be treated as concurrent, and could not have been conjoined, and that the principle of the *Portobello Pier Company's*¹ case did not apply.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I must own that I have some sympathy with the proposal to refuse to allow decree to go out in the agent's name, but at the same time this is a matter of right, and we can only assent to Mr Wilson's proposal if it falls within some recognised rule of practice. Now, it seems to me that the fatal defect of the argument is that the decree in the other action in the Sheriff Court was granted, and had been extracted, before this

¹ Portobello Pier Company v. Clift, March 16, 1877, 4 R. 685.

No. 181. appeal ever came into Court. It had therefore passed into the region of a judgment debt, historically no doubt arising out of a dispute on the same subject-matter, but not out of a living proceeding.

July 8, 1897.
Paolo v.
Parias.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the case of *Clift*¹ does not apply, and that we cannot refuse the motion.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT approved the Auditor's report on the defender's account of expenses, and decerned against the pursuer for the sum of £15, 4s. 4d., the taxed amount thereof, and allowed decree therefor to go out and be extracted in name of William Ritchie Rodger, S.S.C., the agent-disburser thereof.

J. B. DOUGLAS & MITCHELL, W.S.—W. RITCHIE RODGER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 182. JOHN TURNBULL SMITH AND OTHERS (Whitehead's Trustees),
First Parties.—A. S. D. Thomson.

July 6, 1897.
Whitehead's
Trustees v.
Whitehead.

MISS M. M. WHITEHEAD AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—J. H. Millar.
WILLIAM MACLEOD AND ANOTHER (Wright's Trustees),
Third Parties.—Horne.

Succession—Liferent or Fee—Residue—Direction to trustees to invest for behoof of A and pay interest—Right to renounce liferent.—In his trust-disposition and settlement executed in 1858 a testator who had three daughters, one married and two unmarried, directed his trustees, previous to their dividing the residue of his estate, "to set apart and invest" in their own names £1600 in two sums of £800 each "for behoof of" his two unmarried daughters M and W, "the interest thereof to be paid to them respectively so long as they remain unmarried," declaring that in the event of either of them contracting marriage or dying, the interest on the sum "effeiring to such daughter" should be paid to the other so long as she remained unmarried. The testator further authorised his trustees to pay to each daughter on her marriage a sum not exceeding £200 "out of the said sum of £1600" for outfit, and then directed his trustees after payment of his debts, and "after investing the said sum of £1600," to make over the residue of his estate to his three daughters, share and share alike, "but deducting from the shares of my said children . . . any sum . . . that may have been paid by my said trustees to any of my said daughters for outfit in the event of the marriage of either of them." In the event of any of the children dying before the period of division, her share was to accrue to the survivors.

The testator was survived by his three daughters.

Held (1) that the provision in the residuary clause that the sums paid by the trustees for marriage outfit from the £1600 should be deducted from M and W's shares of residue shewed the testator's intention that the fee of the £1600 should form part of the residue, and that it fell to be disposed of accordingly, and (2) that the unmarried daughters were entitled to renounce their liferents of the £1600, and to obtain immediate payment of their shares of the capital thereof as residue.

1ST DIVISION. WILLIAM WHITEHEAD died on 24th June 1866, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement executed in 1858 whereby he conveyed his whole estate to trustees.

The first purpose of the deed was for payment of the truster's debts, &c., and by the second purpose provision was made for conveying the deceased's business to his only son, Josiah Whitehead.

The deed then proceeded,—"(Thirdly) I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees, previous to their dividing the residue of my said estate as after mentioned, to set apart and invest on such good security as they may approve of the sum of £1600, in two sums of £800 each, for behoof of my two unmarried daughters, Marion Mason Whitehead and Wilhelmina Whitehead, said sums to be so invested in the names of my said trustees for their behoof, and the interest thereof to be paid to them respectively so long as they remain unmarried, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions; and I also authorise my said trustees to allow my said two unmarried daughters the use and enjoyment of all my household furniture, bed and table linen, silver plate, books, paintings, &c., so long as they remain unmarried; and declaring that, in the event of either of my two daughters contracting marriage or dying, then and in either of these events the interest on the said sum effeiring to such daughter shall be paid by my said trustees to my other unmarried daughter so long as she remains unmarried, and the furniture and other effects above specified shall be enjoyed by such unmarried daughter so long as she remains unmarried: (Fourthly) In the event of the marriage of either or both of my said two daughters Marion Mason Whitehead and Wilhelmina Whitehead, I hereby authorise my said trustees to pay to each of them on her marriage a sum not exceeding £200 out of the said sum of £1600 to be set apart as aforesaid, and that for their outfit: (Fifthly) After payment of all my debts and expense of mournings, and the expenses of realising and recovering my said estate, and after investing the said sum of £1600, I direct and appoint my said trustees to assign, dispoine, convey, and make over the residue of my said estate and effects, heritable and moveable, to and among my three daughters, Euphans Murray Whitehead, spouse of the said John Wallace Wright, and the saids Marion Mason Whitehead and Wilhelmina Whitehead, and that equally among them, share and share alike, but deducting from the shares of my said children any sum or sums of money that may appear to their debit in my business or private ledger at the time of my decease, or any sum or sums that may have been paid by my said trustees to any of my said daughters for outfit in the event of the marriage of either of them: And declaring that in case any of my said children shall die before the division of my said estate, then the share or shares of the child or children so dying shall accresce to the survivors or survivor of my said children, and be equally divided among them, share and share alike: Providing nevertheless that in case the child or children so dying shall have left lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled to the share or shares of the said residue which their deceased parent or parents would have been entitled to if alive."

The truster was survived by his son (who discharged all claims competent to him against his father's estate), and by his three daughters Mrs Wright, Marion, and Wilhelmina.

In 1897 the two unmarried daughters, who had been receiving the income of the sum of £1600, which had been duly invested by the trustees, intimated to Mr Whitehead's trustees that they were advised that the fee of the £1600 had vested in them, and that they desired the trustees to pay over the capital to them. On the other hand, the trustees of Mr Wright (who had come to be in right of any share of residue and intestate succession of her father's estate which fell to Mrs Wright) maintained that the fee of the £1600 had not been disposed of by the trust-settlement, or otherwise that it fell into residue.

No. 182.

July 6, 1897.
Whitehead's
Trustees v.
Whitehead.

No. 181. appeal ever came into Court. It had therefore passed into the region of a judgment debt, historically no doubt arising out of a dispute on the same subject-matter, but not out of a living proceeding.

July 8, 1897.
Paolo v.
Parias.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the case of *Clift*¹ does not apply, and that we cannot refuse the motion.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT approved the Auditor's report on the defender's account of expenses, and decerned against the pursuer for the sum of £15, 4s. 4d., the taxed amount thereof, and allowed decree therefor to go out and be extracted in name of William Ritchie Rodger, S.S.C., the agent-disburser thereof.

J. B. DOUGLAS & MITCHELL, W.S.—W. RITCHIE RODGER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 182. JOHN TURNBULL SMITH AND OTHERS (Whitehead's Trustees),
First Parties.—A. S. D. Thomson.
MISS M. M. WHITEHEAD AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—J. H. Millar.
WILLIAM MACLEOD AND ANOTHER (Wright's Trustees),
Third Parties.—Horne.

July 8, 1897.
Whitehead's
Trustees v.
Whitehead.

Succession—Liferent or Fee—Residue—Direction to trustees to invest for behoof of A and pay interest—Right to renounce liferent.—In his trust-disposition and settlement executed in 1858 a testator who had three daughters, one married and two unmarried, directed his trustees, previous to their dividing the residue of his estate, "to set apart and invest" in their own names £1600 in two sums of £800 each "for behoof of" his two unmarried daughters M and W, "the interest thereof to be paid to them respectively so long as they remain unmarried," declaring that in the event of either of them contracting marriage or dying, the interest on the sum "effeiring to such daughter" should be paid to the other so long as she remained unmarried. The testator further authorised his trustees to pay to each daughter on her marriage a sum not exceeding £200 "out of the said sum of £1600" for outfit, and then directed his trustees after payment of his debts, and "after investing the said sum of £1600," to make over the residue of his estate to his three daughters, share and share alike, "but deducting from the shares of my said children . . . any sum . . . that may have been paid by my said trustees to any of my said daughters for outfit in the event of the marriage of either of them." In the event of any of the children dying before the period of division, her share was to accrue to the survivors. The testator was survived by his three daughters.

Held (1) that the provision in the residuary clause that the sums paid by the trustees for marriage outfit from the £1600 should be deducted from M and W's shares of residue shewed the testator's intention that the fee of the £1600 should form part of the residue, and that it fell to be disposed of accordingly, and (2) that the unmarried daughters were entitled to renounce their liferents of the £1600, and to obtain immediate payment of their shares of the capital thereof as residue.

1ST DIVISION. WILLIAM WHITEHEAD died on 24th June 1866, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement executed in 1858 whereby he conveyed his whole estate to trustees.

The first purpose of the deed was for payment of the truster's debts, &c., and by the second purpose provision was made for conveying the deceased's business to his only son, Josiah Whitehead.

The deed then proceeded,—"(Thirdly) I hereby direct and appoint

¹ 4 R. 685.

my said trustees, previous to their dividing the residue of my said estate as after mentioned, to set apart and invest on such good security as they may approve of the sum of £1600, in two sums of £800 each, for behoof of my two unmarried daughters, Marion Mason Whitehead and Wilhelmina Whitehead, said sums to be so invested in the names of my said trustees for their behoof, and the interest thereof to be paid to them respectively so long as they remain unmarried, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions; and I also authorise my said trustees to allow my said two unmarried daughters the use and enjoyment of all my household furniture, bed and table linen, silver plate, books, paintings, &c., so long as they remain unmarried; and declaring that, in the event of either of my two daughters contracting marriage or dying, then and in either of these events the interest on the said sum effeiring to such daughter shall be paid by my said trustees to my other unmarried daughter so long as she remains unmarried, and the furniture and other effects above specified shall be enjoyed by such unmarried daughter so long as she remains unmarried: (Fourthly) In the event of the marriage of either or both of my said two daughters Marion Mason Whitehead and Wilhelmina Whitehead, I hereby authorise my said trustees to pay to each of them on her marriage a sum not exceeding £200 out of the said sum of £1600 to be set apart as aforesaid, and that for their outfit: (Fifthly) After payment of all my debts and expense of mournings, and the expenses of realising and recovering my said estate, and after investing the said sum of £1600, I direct and appoint my said trustees to assign, dispoise, convey, and make over the residue of my said estate and effects, heritable and moveable, to and among my three daughters, Euphans Murray Whitehead, spouse of the said John Wallace Wright, and the saids Marion Mason Whitehead and Wilhelmina Whitehead, and that equally among them, share and share alike, but deducting from the shares of my said children any sum or sums of money that may appear to their debit in my business or private ledger at the time of my decease, or any sum or sums that may have been paid by my said trustees to any of my said daughters for outfit in the event of the marriage of either of them: And declaring that in case any of my said children shall die before the division of my said estate, then the share or shares of the child or children so dying shall accresce to the survivors or survivor of my said children, and be equally divided among them, share and share alike: Providing nevertheless that in case the child or children so dying shall have left lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled to the share or shares of the said residue which their deceased parent or parents would have been entitled to if alive."

The trustor was survived by his son (who discharged all claims competent to him against his father's estate), and by his three daughters Mrs Wright, Marion, and Wilhelmina.

In 1897 the two unmarried daughters, who had been receiving the income of the sum of £1600, which had been duly invested by the trustees, intimated to Mr Whitehead's trustees that they were advised that the fee of the £1600 had vested in them, and that they desired the trustees to pay over the capital to them. On the other hand, the trustees of Mr Wright (who had come to be in right of any share of residue and intestate succession of her father's estate which fell to Mrs Wright) maintained that the fee of the £1600 had not been disposed of by the trust-settlement, or otherwise that it fell into residue.

No. 182.

July 6, 1897.
Whitehead's
Trustees v.
Whitehead.

No. 182.

July 6, 1897.
Whitehead's
Trustees v.
Whitehead.

Accordingly, a special case was presented to the First Division by Mr Whitehead's trustees, of the first part, Miss Whitehead and her unmarried sister, of the second part, and Mr Wright's trustees, of the third part, in which the following questions were submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"1. Has the fee of the said sum of £1600 been disposed of by the said settlement? Or, 2. Does it fall into intestacy? In the event of the first alternative being affirmed—3. Has the fee of the said sum vested in the second parties? And if so, 4. Are the first parties bound to denude of the said sum now, or must they retain the capital until the expiry of the liferents by the deaths or marriages of both the unmarried daughters? In the event of the second alternative being affirmed—5. Are the second parties entitled to renounce their liferent, and to obtain payment of their respective shares of the capital of the said sum?"

Argued for the second parties;—(1) The fee of the sum of £1600 was vested in the two unmarried daughters by the third purpose. It was true that there was no absolute rule that the bequest of the interest of a sum of money carried the principal, but the presumption was that it did. The phraseology here favoured the presumption, for the expression "for their behoof" meant something more than a liferent, and indeed was exclusive of the idea that any other interest existed in the fund. It was not necessary that there should be express words of gift or direction to pay over the capital.¹ Intestacy, which was to be avoided if possible, was the only alternative, for the residuary clause assumed that the £1600 had been already disposed of, and the £1600 could not therefore be treated as residue. (2) Alternatively, the second parties were entitled to renounce their right to the interest, and to obtain payment of their shares of the capital of the £1600 as being residue. They had not a protected liferent, and there was no other beneficiary with an interest in the fee which could be affected.

Argued for the third parties;—There was no implication in Scots law that a liferent of a sum of money gave the fee.² The question whether it did fell to be determined entirely on the construction of each particular deed. Here the words "set apart and invest" indicated that the trustees were to hold the fee, and not pay it over. There were no words to suggest that it was at any time to be handed over. On the contrary, it was clearly the intention of the truster that so long as his daughters remained unmarried, this fund was to form a source of income to them. The capital of it must either be disposed of as residue, or as intestate succession.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—I have found the questions raised in this case attended with a great deal of difficulty. The leading question is, whether the fee of a certain sum of £1600 which the late Mr Whitehead directed his trustees to invest for behoof of his daughters Marion and Wilhelmina Whitehead vested in them a morte testatoris, or whether it came under the residuary clause of his settlement and fell to be divided between them and a married daughter, Mrs Wright, or those now in her right.

¹ Lawson's Trustees v. Lawson, July 17, 1890, 17 R. 1167; Ritchie's Trustees v. Ritchie, March 16, 1894, 21 R. 679; Greenlees' Trustees v. Greenlees, Dec. 4, 1894, 22 R. 136.

² Sanderson's Executor v. Kerr, Dec. 21, 1860, 23 D. 227; Alves v. Alves, March 8, 1861, 23 D. 712, 33 Scot. Jur. 354.

No. 182.

July 6, 1897.
Whitehead's
Trustees v.
Whitehead.

Mr Whitehead by his trust-disposition and settlement conveyed his whole property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and after certain directions as to the payment of debts and expenses, and the sale of his business to his son, he directed them by the third purpose of the trust, previous to dividing the residue of his estate as thereafter mentioned, to invest the sum of £1600, in two sums of £800 each, for behoof of his two unmarried daughters Marion and Wilhelmina, said sums to be invested in the names of the trustees for their behoof, the interest to be paid to them so long as they should remain unmarried. He further authorised his trustees to allow them the use of his household furniture, &c., so long as they should remain unmarried—declaring that in the event of either of them marrying or dying the interest on the sum effeiring to such daughter should be paid to the survivor so long as she remained unmarried, and that she also should have the use of the furniture. By the fourth purpose the truster authorised his trustees to pay to each of his daughters on marriage a sum not exceeding £200 out of the £1600 directed to be set apart as aforesaid, and that for their outfit.

By the fifth purpose of the trust the truster directed his trustees, after payment of his debts, the expenses of realising his estate, and after investing the said sum of £1600, to assign, dispoise, convey, and make over the residue of his estate to his three daughters, equally among them, share and share alike, but deducting from the shares of his children any sum of money that might appear at their debit in his business or private ledger at the time of his decease, or any sum that might have been paid by his trustees to any of his daughters for outfit in the event of the marriage of either of them; and then there is a destination to the survivors at the period of the division of his estate, failing issue of the predeceasing child.

Now, it will be observed that by the third purpose of the deed the trustees are directed to invest two sums of £800 each in their own names for behoof of his two unmarried daughters, and that there are directions as to the disposal of the interest thereof, so long as either of them continues to live and remains unmarried, but there are no directions at all given as to the disposal of the fee thereof. It is true that by the fourth purpose the trustees are authorised to pay £200 to a daughter for her outfit in the event of her marriage, but that is the only express direction given as to the disposal of the fee of the £1600, or any part of it.

It was argued to us with great force, that as the money was directed to be invested for behoof of the daughters, that necessarily implied that the fee was held by the trustees for them; that the directions as to the payment of interest were not inconsistent with that view; and that the fee accordingly had vested in them.

I should have been disposed to give effect to this construction of the deed had I thought that the fee of the £1600 was not otherwise disposed of, but I think that there are implied directions with regard to it to be found in the residuary clause.

By that clause the truster directed the immediate division among his daughters of the whole of his estate, except this sum of £1600, which was not divisible until both unmarried daughters were either dead or married, and that equally among them. The only sum therefore which would remain in the trustees' hands was this sum of £1600.

No. 182.

July 6, 1897.
Whitehead's
Trustees v.
Whitehead.

But there is an express direction to deduct from the share of any child any sum which might appear to her debit in the truster's books, or have been paid by the trustees to her for outfit on her marriage. It appears to me that the share of which the truster is here speaking, and from which such payment, if any, is to be deducted, is a share of the residua. But such a payment by the trustees could only be made out of the £1600, and after the death of the truster. It appears to me, therefore, that the truster intended that that sum should be included in and dealt with as part of the residue of his estate. I think, accordingly, that the truster intended that each daughter should have an equal share of the fee of his estate.

My opinion therefore is that the first question should be answered in the affirmative, and that that is the only question which can be answered in terms. But it follows from my opinion that a right to the fee of two-thirds of the £1600 has vested in the second parties, and if they choose to renounce their liferents, there is no reason why the sum should not be immediately divisible. The liferents given to them are not protected liferents.

LORD MONCREIFF.—If the case depended upon the third purpose of the trust-deed alone, there might be grounds for holding that the fee of the sum of £1600 belongs to the truster's two unmarried daughters, the second parties to this case, the direction being that the money is to be "invested" for behoof of these ladies.

The difficulty is created by the fourth and fifth purposes of the trust. By the fourth purpose it is provided that in the event of the marriage of either or both of these ladies the trustees are authorised to pay to each for her outfit a sum not exceeding £200 out of that sum of £1600; and in the fifth purpose it is provided that from the shares of residue falling to any of the truster's daughters, there shall be deducted, inter alia, "any sum or sums which may have been paid by my said trustees to any of my said daughters for outfit, in the event of the marriage of either of them." The daughters here mentioned are clearly the unmarried daughters, because to them alone are the trustees authorised to pay sums for outfit on marriage.

Now, these provisions seem to me to indicate that the purpose for which the sum of £1600 was set aside was to provide a fund for the support of the truster's unmarried daughters, so long as they remained unmarried, but that it was intended that when this purpose was served, on both daughters either marrying or dying, the fee of that sum should fall into residue and be divided among the three daughters or their representatives subject to the deductions mentioned.

If the sum of £1600 were a fund in which the third daughter, who was married during the truster's lifetime, had no interest, why should the truster direct that any sum by which that fund might be diminished by advances from capital made by the trustees for the outfit of the unmarried daughters or either of them should be deducted from the shares of residue falling to them? If the argument for the second parties were correct, they, if they both married, would carry off the fee of the £1600, and thus their share of residue would suffer no deduction.

I am therefore of opinion that the fee of the sum of £1600 does not belong in fee to the second parties alone, but that it has been disposed of in the will as residue, and that right to a share of that fund as residue is vested in the second and third parties. I am further of opinion that the second parties are entitled to renounce their liferent and obtain payment of their shares of the said sum as residue.

No. 182.

July 6, 1897.
Whitehead's
Trustees v.
Whitehead.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion as that expressed by Lord Adam and by Lord Moncreiff. I see the force of the argument that when a truster has directed a capital sum to be invested for certain beneficiaries there is an inference prima facie that the money so invested is to be held for them, or in other words, that there is a gift to them of the capital sum, if there is nothing in the will to set aside or displace that inference. But then, if the purpose of setting apart and investing the money is to provide an annual income to the truster's daughters during their lives, or so long as they remain unmarried, out of money which is ultimately destined to others, either to their exclusion or along with them, it would be perfectly accurate to say that the money is invested in the name of the trustees for their behoof, for the sole purpose of so investing it is their security and protection, the ultimate purpose requiring no such investment for its execution. The construction, therefore, of such a destination appears to me to depend not so much on the introductory direction to invest as upon the true meaning and effect of the clause which directs the appropriation of the money. And if it be clear on a fair and reasonable reading of this clause that the testator intended something else than an absolute gift, then I see no difficulty in giving effect to the direction.

I agree with Lord Adam and with Lord Moncreiff that on a sound construction of this deed the testator did not intend to make an absolute gift to the two unmarried daughters. The express directions in their favour are simply for the payment of interest, while they or one of them remain unmarried and in life. That would probably not be conclusive of itself if there were no directions as to the disposal of the capital. But then there appears to me to be a sufficiently clear direction as to the disposal of the capital to relieve the case of substantial difficulty.

The testator goes on to dispose of the residue of his estate, and although he directs that this money is to be invested before the ascertainment of the residue, there is nothing to indicate that the money so invested is to be excluded from the residue. I say that because in the previous part of the will there is no direction, express or implied, for the disposal of the capital at all, so that if the residuary clause when considered by itself is sufficient to carry it, I see nothing in the direction that the investment is to be made before the ascertainment of the residue to exclude its effect on this particular sum. Now, when the deed goes on to direct what is to be done with the residue, and to declare that it is to be divided among his three daughters, including Marion and Wilhelmina, he goes on to say that in ascertaining the equal shares of these three daughters the trustees are to deduct any sums that may have been paid to any of his daughters for outfit in the event of their marriage. But then the sums so authorised to be paid, and consequently to be deducted, are to be paid out of the invested sums of £800, and therefore when the truster says in order to make the division of the residue equal you are to take into account the advances which may have

No. 182. already been made out of the invested sums, it appears to me that he says in very clear terms that the invested sums are to form part of the residue. Accordingly, I agree with Lord Adam as to the manner in which the questions are to be answered.

July 6, 1897.
Whitehead's
Trustees v.
Whitehead.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD M'LAREN were absent.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative.

ADAM & SANG, W.S.—MELVILLE & LINDESAY, W.S.—A. & A. S. GORDON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 183. WILLIAM TURNER RUSSELL AND OTHERS (Millar's Trustees), Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Salvesen—W. Thomson.

July 10, 1897.
Millar's
Trustees v.
Polson.

REVEREND JOHN POLSON, Defender (Respondent).—Shaw—Watt.

Trust—Personal liability of trustee—Culpa lata—Failure to sue co-trustee for trust-funds misappropriated by him—Defence that no loss resulted from failure.—In February 1895 A, a trustee, discovered that B, his co-trustee, who acted as agent for the trust, had retained in his own hands trust-money amounting to £150 which he had been instructed to place on deposit-receipt with a bank. A at once applied to B for repayment of the amount, and continued at intervals to press for repayment, but he took no legal proceedings against B, although about midsummer he became suspicious that B was in pecuniary difficulties. A also took no steps to prevent B intromitting further with the trust funds, and at Whitsunday 1895 B collected the rent of a heritable property belonging to the trust-estate, and retained it for his own purposes. In November 1895 A was preparing to take legal proceedings against B when B became bankrupt.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Pearson) (1) that A was guilty of culpa lata in not taking legal proceedings against B without delay for recovery of the £150, but that he was not liable to repay that sum to the trust-estate, in respect that it was proved that nothing would have been recovered from B if proceedings had been taken against him; (2) that A was guilty of culpa lata in not taking immediate steps, on discovering B's misconduct, to prevent him intromitting further with the trust funds, and that he was liable to repay to the trust-estate the amount of the Whitsunday rent which B had appropriated.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Pearson.

WILLIAM MILLAR, solicitor in Jedburgh, died in 1879, leaving a disposition of his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, in favour of his widow. In 1880 Mrs Millar, as the result of a family arrangement between herself and her children, executed a trust-deed by which she disposed of her whole estate to trustees. The purposes of the trust were generally that the trustees should pay the income of the estate to Mrs Millar during her lifetime, and hold the capital for behoof of her family.

The trustees appointed by the deed were the Reverend John Polson, William Elliot, Sheriff-clerk of Roxburghshire, and a Mr Catto (who resigned in 1883). Mr Polson and Mr Elliot continued to act as trustees until the spring of 1896, when they resigned, having previously assumed William Turner Russell and others as trustees under the trust.

In August 1896 William Turner Russell and his co-trustees brought an action against the Reverend John Polson for payment of two sums of £150 and £95, 17s. 6d.

It appeared from the averments of parties that the defender's co-trustee, Mr Elliot, had done the work of agent to the trust, and that he had appropriated to his own uses (1) a sum of £150 belonging to the trust-estate, which he had been instructed, at a meeting of trustees held in the end of November 1894, to put on deposit-receipt; and (2) the rents of heritable estate which formed part of the trust-estate due at Martinmas 1894 and at Whitsunday 1895.

No. 183.
July 10, 1897.
Millar's
Trustees v.
Polson.

The pursuers averred that the sums sued for had been lost to the trust-estate through the negligence of the defender. They alleged that the defender had been made aware, shortly after the end of November 1894, that Mr Elliot had not placed the £150 upon deposit-receipt as instructed, and that, if required to do so, Mr Elliot would have repaid the sum.

The defender denied that he had been in any way negligent, and averred that Mr Elliot had been hopelessly insolvent in November 1894, and that proceedings against him would have been fruitless.

The material facts of the case, as disclosed by the proof, were as follows:—From 1881 onwards Mr Elliot had done the work of agent to the trust. Mrs Millar, the liferentrix, died in June 1894, and the sole duty remaining to the trustees was to realise the estate and divide it among the beneficiaries, which they proceeded to do. In November 1894, as the result of the realisation of part of the estate, there was a sum of £200 in bank to the credit of the trust. At a meeting of trustees held at the end of November Mr Elliot was instructed to lift this sum and place it upon four deposit-receipts of £50 each, and to enable him to do so a cheque for £200 was signed by himself and Mr Polson. Contrary to the instructions given him, Mr Elliot only placed £50 on deposit-receipt, and retained the remaining £150 for his own uses. In the beginning of February the defender was made aware that the whole £200 had not been placed on deposit-receipt by Mr Elliot, and he applied to Mr Elliot for an explanation. No satisfactory explanation was given by Mr Elliot, and the result of what Mr Elliot said was to convince Mr Polson that Mr Elliot had retained the sum in his own hands. From this time onwards Mr Polson made repeated applications, both verbally and in writing, to Mr Elliot for repayment of the money, and for an account of his intromissions, without success. About midsummer the defender became suspicious that Mr Elliot was in pecuniary difficulties. Until this date he had no reason to suspect that this was the case, apart from Mr Elliot's conduct in retaining the funds of the trust in his own hands. From information which he received in the latter part of October 1895 the defender's suspicions as to Mr Elliot's pecuniary difficulties were confirmed. On 22d November the defender wrote to Mr Elliot demanding repayment of the trust-money within one month on pain of legal proceedings, and in the same month he appointed a law-agent to act in the matter. On 27th November the defender became aware that Mr Elliot had appropriated the rents of a property belonging to the trust called Bellevue, due at Martinmas 1894 and Whitsunday 1895, and he then took steps to prevent Mr Elliot further intromitting with the trust funds. The month having elapsed without payment being made, the defender again wrote to Mr Elliot, who replied that it was no use instituting proceedings against him as he had granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors.

The evidence further shewed that Mr Elliot was hopelessly insolvent long prior to 1895, and that proceedings against him in that year would not have resulted in any benefit to the trust-estate. The details of the evidence on this point appear sufficiently from the opinion of the Lord President.

No. 183. On 19th January 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) assolizied the defender from the conclusions of the action.*

July 10, 1897.

Millar's
Trustees v.
Polson.

* "OPINION.— . . . Now I have considered very carefully whether, in the circumstances of the case, Mr Polson's conduct amounts to culpa lata so as to render Mr Polson liable to restoration of that money ; and taking it, as I do, that that is a question to be determined on the circumstances of each case, I have come, though not without hesitation, to the conclusion that Mr Polson's conduct is not within the category of culpa lata. Most of the cases where culpa lata has been affirmed have had features in them which are markedly absent from this case. In the first place, the leading cases in that branch of the law have nearly all of them been cases where trustees have allowed money to get into the hands of their co-trustees or their factor, and have done nothing at all ; and if a trustee does nothing at all—even for such a time as twelve months, possibly even for a shorter time—he may be held to have omitted his duty, and therefore to be liable as a man who takes no steps whatever for the recovery of what is due to the trust. Then, further, in most of the cases where the Court has affirmed liability on this ground a very much longer period of inactivity had elapsed than in the present case. Then another point that arises on a comparison of this case with others is that here there is no disregard of any express direction or injunction of the truster. Where there is such disregard (as in the recent case of *Carruthers' Trustees*¹), the Court will infer culpa lata, and will not closely inquire whether any loss which occurs is proved to have resulted from the omission or the culpable act. No doubt, looking back upon it, one sees that Mr Polson might have taken, and ought to have taken, much more stringent steps. It is suggested that he ought at once to have sued Mr Elliot. I can hardly assent to that proposition. What I think he ought to have done was to instruct an independent agent to write to Mr Elliot and demand the money, as under threat of litigation. But the question whether and at what stage that should be done is to a certain extent a question of judgment or discretion, and though Mr Polson may have exercised his judgment and discretion wrongly, yet, seeing that he pressed Mr Elliot as far as he could press his co-trustee—short of instructing an independent agent to write legal letters to him,—I think on the whole that he has not incurred liability on that head for this money.

"The next part of the case relates to a sum of three* half-years' rents. That stands on a different footing as to the facts. It is in one sense more favourable, and in another sense less favourable to the defender than the other part of the case. On the one hand, trust accounts, if they had been regularly made up and rendered, would have disclosed that the rent for the first half-year of the three now in question had not been paid over to the widow, and had not entered the trust accounts, but had been kept back by Mr Elliot. But although the failure to have regular and stated trust accounts is not a circumstance in favour of a trustee, it is fair to say that it was through no departure from the ordinary course of this trust that the accounts were not made up in due time to shew that Mr Elliot had kept back the first or the second of these half-years' rents. Then again Mr Polson cannot be said to have had it brought to his actual knowledge till about Martinmas 1895 that the rent was kept back ; and therefore he is in a more favourable position as to actual knowledge as to these rents than he was about the other moneys. On the whole I think his position is stronger as to these rents than it was as to the £150, and if I am right in what I

¹ 23 R. (H. L.) 55.

* The pursuers claimed the half year's rent due at Martinmas 1895 as well as the rents due at the two preceding terms, but the proof shewed that the rent due at Martinmas 1895 was received by the trust.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) In omitting for the best part of a whole year to take proceedings against his co-trustee for re-payment of money which he was well aware his co-trustee had misappropriated, the defender was guilty of culpa lata.¹ (2) The defence that the loss suffered by the trust-estate was not the result of his negligence had not been made out. The onus was upon the defender to establish this defence, and so strong was the onus that in no case had this defence been sustained.² (3) The defender was in any view responsible for the loss of the rent due at Whitsunday, for with his knowledge of his co-trustee's misconduct in the matter of the

No. 183.
July 10, 1897.
Miller's
Trustees v.
Polson.

have said as to that sum, the same result will follow as to this part of the case.

“The next point argued for the defender was that even if culpa lata had been proved, there was no proof whatever of loss resulting to the estate from the default of the trustee; and, inasmuch as this is an action practically for damages for breach of trust, no damage is qualified. In the view I have stated it becomes unnecessary to decide this point, but I must not be taken as assenting to the defender's view that if he had been otherwise liable he could in this case have escaped liability in respect of the plea that the trust-estate has not suffered any loss through his default. The plea is founded upon this undoubted fact, that for at least three years prior to his sequestration in January 1896 Mr Elliot was behind the world to the extent of about £5000, and was hopelessly insolvent all that time; and the argument urged for the defender was this:—That in these circumstances pressure by Mr Polson at any time during 1894 and 1895 would have resulted either in bringing down Mr Elliot and so depriving the estate of the possibility of getting the money back (for there is practically no dividend expected in the sequestration), or else would have produced the money by Mr Elliot getting it unduly and fraudulently from somebody else. Now, if that view were made out, that might be sufficient for the defender's case; but it seems to me that the argument as put lays a burden of proof on the beneficiaries which they are not bound to undertake. When Mr Elliot was brought to bay, and Purvis's trustees raised their action in November 1895 for £700 or £800, a relative came forward and settled the claim—it is true it was settled for 5s. per £—and the action was brought to a conclusion; and I suppose the trust-deed was granted as part of the arrangement. That shews that Mr Elliot had not come to an end of his friends' willingness to aid, and in view of that circumstance I cannot assume that if pressure had been put upon him earlier by Mr Polson, the money might not have been produced otherwise than by Mr Elliot helping himself to other people's money fraudulently. Again there are indications in the proof that Mr Elliot's business credit was not exhausted during the years of hopeless insolvency, for there were bills and advances made to him of larger amount than would have sufficed to restore this money to the trust-estate. I do not at all say that it is impossible for a trustee to make good such a plea if the facts bear it out; but it does appear to me that the burden of proving that part of the case is on him and not on the beneficiaries, and that he has not in the present case discharged that burden.”

¹ Lewin on Trusts (9th ed.), pp. 217 and 290; M'Laren on Wills and Succession, sec. 2269; Forman v. Burns, Feb. 2, 1853, 15 D. 362, 25 Scot. Jur. 221; Billing v. Brogden, 1886, L. R. 38 Ch. Div., 546; Blain v. Paterson, Jan. 28, 1836, 14 S. 361; Styles v. Guy, 1849, 1 Macnaghten and Gordon, 422; Wynne v. Tempest, April 10, 1897, 13 Times Law Rep. 360.

² Styles v. Guy, supra; Billing v. Brogden, supra; Stiven v. Watson, Jan. 27, 1874, 1 R. 412; Carruthers v. Carruthers, July 13, 1896, 23 R. (H. L.) 55; Dominion Bank v. Bank of Scotland, July 19, 1889, 16 R. 1081; Wynne v. Tempest, supra.

No. 183

July 10, 1897.
 Millar &
 Trustees v.
 Polson.

£150 he should have taken care that he had no further intrusions with the trust-estate.

Argued for the defender;—There was no doubt as to the rule to be applied to cases like the present. The prudence which a trustee was required to exercise was the prudence of the average man.¹ Judged by that standard, the defender had not been negligent. He did everything he could short of legal proceedings, and it was not unreasonable that he should hesitate to take that step, looking to Mr Elliot's reputation and credit. If he had been wrong in not suing his co-trustee the error was one of judgment. His delay in instituting legal proceedings was short compared with the period in Blain,² where the delay had been for nine years, and in *Styles*³ where it had been for six years. (2) But even if the defender had failed in his duty it was clearly proved that no loss had resulted from that failure, as nothing could have been recovered from Elliot, and no liability therefore attached to the defender.⁴

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no controversy as to the material facts of this case; and I accept unreservedly the evidence of the defender, which is perfectly candid and distinct.

It appears then, that in the beginning of February 1895 it came to the knowledge of the defender that Mr Elliot, his sole co-trustee, had not lodged in bank on deposit-receipt a sum of £150 of trust money, which had been entrusted to him for that purpose. This information did not come from Mr Elliot. The defender at once went to Mr Elliot and asked for explanations. He got none that satisfied him. Admittedly, Mr Elliot had not put the money in bank, and he gave no account of what he had done with it. Some words were used about a five per cent investment, but they did not deceive the defender. He says, frankly, "I thought he was keeping the money in his possession and using it for his own purposes, and was offering to pay five per cent upon it or something of that kind."

From February onwards then the defender knew that this £150 of trust money was in Mr Elliot's hands, contrary to express instructions, and that it was applied to his own uses. It admits of no doubt that, prima facie, it was the duty of the defender to take immediate steps to compel the replacement of the money. Beyond vague promises that the money would be repaid, the defender got nothing to re-assure him. The fact of Elliot's default could only be accounted for by his being desperately in want of money. The defender does not profess to have at first abstained from action for any politic reason, in the belief that some temporary difficulty was to be tided over; and, as time passed, things looked worse and worse, and called more and more clamantly for decisive action. By midsummer the defender knew, apart from the default in question, that Elliot was in difficulties. In October he saw Elliot's brother-in-law, Mr Stevenson, and his suspicions were confirmed. Yet from February to November the defender allowed

¹ Knox v. Mackinnon, Aug. 7, 1888, 15 R. (H. L.) 83, per Lord Watson, p. 87.

² Blain v. Paterson, 14 S. 361.

³ 1 Macnaghten and Gordon, 422.

⁴ Hobday v. Peters, 1860, 28 Beav. 603.

himself (to use his own phrase) to be trifled with by Elliot. He clung to the hope that the money would be repaid, and took no legal action. No. 183.

The true state of Elliot's finances and his inability to pay anything were not known to the defender, or indeed to anyone outside Elliot's own office; and accordingly are not advanced by the defender as accounting for his inaction. July 10, 1897.
Millar's
Trustees v.
Polson.

It seems to me that these facts constitute a clear, and I may say, a strong case of culpa lata. The defender was one of two trustees; his co-trustee appropriates to his own uses £150 of trust money, which he had been entrusted with for investment, and conceals the fact, which was only accidentally discovered; no presentable excuse is made, nor is any reasonable prospect given of the money being replaced, if time is given. It is, of course, disagreeable to take a co-trustee by the throat, but if a man undertakes to act as trustee he must face the necessity of doing disagreeable things when they become necessary in order to keep the estate intact. A trustee is not entitled to purchase a quiet life at the expense of the estate, or to act as good-natured men sometimes do in their own affairs, in letting things slide and losing money rather than create ill-feeling.

If it be asked what ought the defender to have done, the answer is obvious. Owing to the default of his sole co-trustee, the defender was placed in the position of a sole acting trustee, deprived of the legal assistance of his co-trustee. His duty was clear. He ought without delay to have instructed a lawyer to recover the missing £150, and he ought to have seen to it (by himself or through the lawyer) that the rest of the trust-estate was safe, and did not get into the hands of Elliot. A lawyer so instructed would naturally have written Elliot, intimating that unless the £150 was replaced within a given number of days a summons would be served, and steps would have been taken to prevent the Whitsunday rent from getting into Elliot's hands.

The latter precaution as well as the former was omitted by the defender, and the Whitsunday rent of Bellevue was allowed to be uplifted by Elliot. It is nothing to say that the defender did not know that Elliot was uplifting these rents. Once he knew that his sole co-trustee was intercepting trust funds and applying them to his own uses, the defender ought to have taken alarm about the whole trust-estate, and to have seen where it was and where it was going.

The next defence is that, even assuming that the defender has made himself liable for the loss resulting to the trust-estate through his omissions, yet no loss has in fact occurred, because nothing could have been recovered from Elliot. It is necessary to observe that, in the view which I take, this defence does not apply to the Whitsunday rent, for, if the defender had done his duty, it would have been intercepted and would never have got into Elliot's hands at all. Of the two sums which I have mentioned, this defence can only apply to the £150.

Now, it is clear that the burden of proof is on the defender. It is for the defender to prove that if he had done his duty the loss would equally have resulted. The defender has recognised this, and has placed before us very full information about the financial position of Elliot. He has proved that in and for long prior to 1895 Elliot was hopelessly insolvent. Now, where a trustee states the defence which we are now considering, I should

No. 183. not in every case be content with proof that the debtor's own means were exhausted. Some men, after their own means are exhausted, have other resources,—they can appeal to their friends. Take the case of a young merchant, the son of a rich and liberal man. If he were indebted to a trust-estate the circumstances might be such that, even if it were proved that his own means were exhausted, the trustee might not have negatived the likelihood that, if action had been raised, the debt would have been recovered, especially if it touched the honour of the debtor. But the present case is in strong contrast to that which I have figured. The sequestrated estate of Elliot is not expected to pay any dividend at all. He is about seventy years of age. He had been in pecuniary straits for years. He had borrowed from friends, but seems to have come to an end of his resources in that quarter before 1895, and to have betaken himself to less defensible methods. The witness Steadman says,—“He paid pressing creditors by taking from one client to pay another.”

July 10, 1897.
Millar's
Trustees v.
Polson.

Now, on this evidence, I am prepared to hold that the defender has made out his case. The only suggestion to the contrary which is at all consistent with the facts comes to be that if the defender had sued Elliot for the £150, Elliot would have stolen the money from some third party and have paid it to the defender. I own that there is great plausibility in this conjecture. But in such a surmise, I feel myself to be out of the region of legitimate inference.

The only other suggestion of possible aid coming from friends arises from the fact that in November 1895 some claim by people called Purvis' trustees was bought off at 5s. per £ by General Boswell, a brother-in-law of Elliot. We do not know anything but the fact, and I am unable to infer from this that General Boswell would again have intervened, or that any other General Boswell was available. The onus on the defender cannot impose on him the necessity of negating such remote conjectures.

My opinion on the whole case is that, in February 1895, and certainly before Whitsunday 1895, it was the duty of the defender to take steps for the recovery of the £150 and for the interception of the Whitsunday rent of Bellevue, that his omission to do so constitutes culpa lata, that he is liable for the Whitsunday 1895 rent of Bellevue, with interest from that date, and that no loss has been sustained by the trust-estate through the omission of the defender in the matter of the £150. The pursuers claimed from the defender another half-year's rent of Bellevue due at Martinmas 1894. As that rent fell due and was ingathered by Elliot before the defalcation of the £150 and its discovery, some culpa lata must be found to support this demand other than that which I hold proved. I have only to say that I think the pursuers' case on this head has entirely failed, but even if it had not, the same defence would avail the defender as I sustain regarding the £150. In my view, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be recalled and decree granted for the Whitsunday rent of Bellevue, with interest, the defender being quoad ultra assoilzied.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Recall the said interlocutor: Decern against the defender for payment to the pursuers, as trustees foresaid, of the sum of £30, 17s. 6d., being the rent of Bellevue due at Whitsunday 1895, with interest thereon from said term until paid at the rate of 5 per centum per annum: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defender: Find no expenses due to or by either party, and decern."

No. 183.
July 10, 1897.
Miller's
Trustees v.
Polson.

M'NAUGHT & M'QUEEN, S.S.C.—WINCHESTER & NICHOLSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

MISS MARY ELIZABETH HENRY, Pursuer (Appellant).—Watt.
STRACHAN & SPENCE, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston—W. Brown.

No. 184.

July 10, 1897.
Henry v.
Strachan &
Spence.

Proof—Accession to composition agreement—Writ—Writ of Agent.
Held that the accession by a creditor to a composition agreement may be proved by the writ of his duly authorised agent.

MISS MARY ELIZABETH HENRY raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Strachan & Spence, accountants and stockbrokers there, concluding, inter alia, for payment of £634, 7s. 10d., being the amount paid by the pursuer to the North of Scotland Bank under a letter of guarantee granted by the pursuer on behalf of the defenders, and also for payment of £1100 contained in a promissory-note granted by the defenders in favour of the pursuer.

The defenders stated that early in 1894 they had found it necessary to make an arrangement with their creditors, and that on 3d April 1894 the pursuer, through her agents, Messrs Morice & Wilson, agreed with the defenders that the pursuer should accept a composition arrangement.

The pursuer denied that she had agreed to accept the composition, and averred that she had not given Mr Wilson authority to accept for her.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—5. The defenders' statements can only be proved by writ or oath. 6. The defences, so far as founded on the alleged composition settlement, should be repelled, (1) in respect the pursuer never accepted said settlement, either directly or through her agent; (2) that any acceptance thereof given by Messrs Morice & Wilson was unauthorised by, and is not binding on, the pursuer.

The defenders pleaded;—6. In respect that the pursuer agreed to the composition arrangement made by the defenders, and that there has been no failure on their part in carrying through the arrangement, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) allowed a proof.

The following letters were produced:—

Letter by Messrs Edmonds & Ledingham, the defenders' agents, to Messrs Morice & Wilson, as agents for the pursuer, dated 11th April 1894.—Dear Sirs,—Strachan & Spence.—“ . . . Will you please inform us in writing that your client will, in full of her claim, accept the arrangements formerly proposed, coupled with a guarantee by the debtors to her, in common with other creditors, for 5s. per £ within twelve months, and 2s. per £ per annum additional during the next five years, in so far as the trust funds may be insufficient therefor? Pending your reply we retain your summons and copy.”

Letter from Messrs Morice & Wilson to Messrs Edmonds & Ledingham, dated 13th April 1894.—“ We have now had an interview with Miss Henry as to Messrs Strachan & Spence's affairs, and

No. 184. she has authorised us to agree to the terms proposed by you, provided her expenses are paid. . . ."

July 10, 1897.
Henry v.
Strachan &
Spence.

The pursuer deponed that she only authorised Mr Wilson to agree to the composition arrangement on condition that she was allowed interest on the instalments. Mr Wilson deponed that he understood that he had full authority to settle whether he got interest or not. It is not necessary to refer to the other evidence bearing on this question. It is sufficient to state that the Court were satisfied that the pursuer had given authority to Mr Wilson to agree to this composition.

On 23d December 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) found in fact, inter alia, "that this offer was communicated both verbally and (at her request) in writing to pursuer by her agent, Mr Wilson, and that on 13th April following she authorised Mr Wilson to agree to this composition on her behalf, which he accordingly did by letter to Messrs Edmonds & Ledingham of said date," and found in law "that pursuer is bound to concur in said composition arrangement, having agreed to do so through her duly authorised agent," and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—Accession by the pursuer to the composition arrangement, involving as it did the abandonment by her of a large claim against the defenders, could only be proved by her own writ or oath.¹ The mere letter of an agent or factor was not sufficient. In point of fact Mr Wilson had no authority to assent on the pursuer's behalf to the composition arrangement.

Argued for the respondents;—The evidence was clear that the pursuer's agent, Mr Wilson, had full authority to assent to the composition agreement on her behalf. The only question was, Was his writ—viz., the letter of 13th April—competent and sufficient evidence of the fact that the pursuer had acceded? There could be no doubt that his writ was binding on the pursuer.²

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—(After reviewing the evidence, and holding that Mr Wilson was proved to have had authority to accept the composition on behalf of the pursuer)—The only other point in the case is the appellant's plea that accession to the composition agreement can only be proved by writ or oath.

Now, it is a general rule, that where writ is required for the proof of an agreement, as distinguished from its constitution, a letter signed by the party or his agent is sufficient. There may be exceptions, but this is not one of them. Accession to a trust or composition agreement is a matter of fact, and no obligatory writing or other formality is necessary to bind the creditor. According to universal practice, the creditor's signature is sufficient evidence of his accession, and where he is represented by an agent the agent's signature is as good as that of the principal. Assuming that Mr Wilson had his client's authority, which, for the reasons stated, I hold to have been given, Mr Wilson's letter to Mr Ledingham is, in my opinion, sufficient to bind the appellant.

¹ 2 Bell's Comm. 398; M'Gregor v. M'Gregor, June 27, 1860, 22 D. 1264, Lord President at p. 1268, 32 Scot. Jur. 565.

² 2 Bell's Comm. 393, 398; Glass v. M'Intosh, May 12, 1825, 4 S. 1.

No other points were pressed in argument, and my opinion is that we should adhere to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute dismissing the action, with expenses in the Sheriff Court.

No. 184.
July 10, 1897.
Henry v.
Strachan &
Spence.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ANDREW URQUHART, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

MISS MARGARET DOUGLAS CHALMERS AND OTHERS (Chalmers' Trustees), First Parties.—D. Dundas—Abel. No. 185.
MRS EMMA JANE SINCLAIR, Second Party.—W. Campbell—W. Brown. July 10, 1897.
Minor and Pupil—Curator—Married Woman.—Held (diss. Lord Kin- Chalmers' Trustees v. Sinclair. near) that a married woman is disqualified for acting as the curator of a minor.

Kerbechill, 1586, M. 9585; Stuart v. Henderson, 1636, M. 9585, followed.

MR PATRICK HENDERSON CHALMERS, advocate in Aberdeen, died 1st DIVISION on 19th February 1889, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he appointed his wife and certain other persons to be his trustees and executors.

With reference to the guardianship of his children the truster made the following provision :—"And I hereby appoint my wife, the said Mrs Emma Jane M'Donell or Chalmers, to be sole tutor and curator during all the days of her life, but so long only as she shall remain unmarried, to our child or children, and from and after the death of my said wife, I appoint the said" trustees, "and in the event of the second marriage of my said wife, she shall cease to act as sole tutor and curator to our child or children, but she shall act along with those herein above appointed to act from and after her death, and the survivors and acceptors, or survivor and acceptor, to be tutors and curators, or tutor and curator, to our said child or children, with the fullest powers, privileges, and exemptions."

The truster was survived by his wife and by two sons.

His widow accepted the office of tutor to her sons, and acted as such up to 17th November 1891, when she was married to Mr James Sinclair, residing in London. From that date she continued to act as tutor in conjunction with the other trustees. The elder son attained the age of fourteen on 1st June 1896.

A question having arisen as to the right of Mrs Chalmers or Sinclair to act as a curator to her minor son, a special case was presented to the Court,—the trustees of Mr Chalmers being the parties of the first part, and Mrs Sinclair the party of the second part.

The parties of the first part maintained that, by the law of Scotland, the second party, being a married woman, was not now entitled to act as curator, and that, upon her second marriage, her appointment as curator eo ipso fell and ceased to be of any effect.

The second party, upon the other hand, maintained that she was under the appointment of the truster entitled to act as curator, and that she was not disqualified by her second marriage or otherwise from so acting.

The question submitted to the Court was :—"Is the party of the second part entitled, jointly with the first parties, to the office of curator of her minor son of the marriage between her and the deceased

No. 185. Patrick Henderson Chalmers, and to perform the duties of the said office?"

July 10, 1897.
Chalmers'
Trustees v.
Sinclair.

Argued for the first parties;—By the law of Scotland a married woman was disqualified from acting as a curator,¹ the principle being that one who was herself under curatory could not act as curator to another. It had been expressly decided that a mother, though appointed the testamentary tutor of her pupil child, became disqualified on her second marriage,² and there was no difference in this regard between tutory and curatory. The rule was practically given effect to in the case of the Marquis of Montrose,³ and though in Stoddart's case⁴ Lord Meadowbank disputed the rule as laid down by Erskine,¹ Lord Glenlee distinctly affirmed it, while the point actually decided related solely to the office of trustee. The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, dealt only with the office of tutor. The Act 1696, c. 8, did not expressly exclude married women, because their incapacity was already recognised and there was no necessity or object in enacting it.

Argued for the second party;—No disability attached to a married woman. The sole authority to the contrary was the statement of Erskine.¹ That was a statement of the Roman rather than of the Scots law, and in any view it had been entirely superseded. As early as the case of Stoddart,⁴ it had been challenged. That case decided that a married woman might act as a trustee, and there was no difference in principle between the office of trustee and curator. It had moreover been held that a married woman might act as factor loco tutoris and curator bonis.⁵ The case of *Kerbechill*² dealt with tutory, and the law was admittedly altered with regard to that. The case of the *Marquis of Montrose*³ never reached a decision. It was to be noted that the Act 1696, c. 8, which followed immediately upon the case of the *Marquis of Montrose*³ made no limitation on the persons whom a father might name as guardian. The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, as interpreted by *Campbell v. Maquay*⁶ was entirely favourable to the view that a married woman was not disqualified for acting as a curator.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The late Mr Patrick Chalmers left a trust-disposition and settlement by which he appointed his wife, Mrs Emma Jane M'Donell or Chalmers, now Sinclair, to be sole tutor and curator during all the days of her life, but so long only as she should remain unmarried, to their child or children, and after the death of his wife he appointed certain gentlemen, who were named as trustees under his settlement, to be their tutors and curators, and in the event of his wife's remarriage he declared that she should cease to act as sole tutor or curator to their children, but should act along with those therein above named to act after her death.

Mr Chalmers died in 1889, leaving two sons, both in pupillarity.

Mr Chalmers' widow acted as sole tutor to her children until her marriage

¹ Erskine, Inst. i. 7, 12; cf. Bankton, i. 7, 30; Stair, i. 6, 24.

² Kerbechill, 1586, M. 9585.

³ Marquis of Montrose, 1695, 4 Br. Suppl. 277.

⁴ Stoddart v. Rutherford, 30th June 1812, F. C.

⁵ Lambe v. Ritchie, December 14, 1837, 16 S. 219; Anderson, Jan. 31, 1829, 4 F. 445.

⁶ Campbell v. Maquay, June 27, 1888, 15 R. 784.

to Mr Sinclair in 1891. After that event she acted as tutor along with Mr Chalmers' trustees, as she was entitled to do under the provisions of the Guardianship of Infants Act. The elder son attained minority on the 1st of June 1896. He is entitled not only to a share of his father's estate, which is considerable, but he is also heir of entail in possession of the estate of Monkshill previously possessed by his uncle, General Chalmers.

No. 185.
July 10, 1897.
Chalmers' Trustees v. Sinclair.

These being the facts, the question of law which has arisen is whether Mrs Sinclair, who is the party of the second part, is entitled jointly with Mr Chalmers' trustees, who are the parties of the first part, to the office of curator of her minor son, and to perform the duties of the office—the ground of objection being that a married woman is not entitled to act as a curator.

The earliest case on the subject to which we were referred was that of *Kerbecchill*¹ in 1586. In that case Kerbecchill pursued for delivery of the pupil, who was his nephew. The application was opposed by the child's mother, who pleaded that she was tutrix testamentaria, to which it was answered inierat secundas nuptias, and she replied that it was expressly provided that she should be tutrix, albeit she married again. The Lords found that notwithstanding this provision, the common law ought to be followed forth, and that her tutory testamentary fell per secundas nuptias. If this be still law it appears to me to be directly in point, because I do not think any distinction can be taken between a case of tutrix and a curatrix as in this case.

The same decision was repeated in 1636 in the case of Stuart v. Henderson.² In that case Stuart, who had been served and retoured as tutor at law to the children of his late brother, pursued his brother's widow for exhibition of certain bonds belonging to the pupil in her hands. She had been appointed by her husband tutrix to the children, but had married again. She pleaded that she had not ceased to be tutrix, because her husband had nominated her to be tutrix during the whole time of their pupillarity as well after her second marriage as during the time of her widowhood. The Lords, however, found that notwithstanding this provision of the testament she had tint her office by her second marriage.

The next case on the subject to which we were referred was that of the *Marquis of Montrose*³ in 1695. The Marquis had nominated his mother as one of his curators along with others. The Lords thought she, being clad with a husband, could no more be a curator than a minor could be, not having a person in law. The rest of the curators then present were sworn de fideli, but her ladyship's nomination was forborne till it was farther considered. But it does not appear what the result of such farther consideration was, if there was any.

Lord Stair, i. 6, 24, says that tutory is finished "by the marriage of a tutrix testamentrix, which no provision even of the testator can dispense with."

Mr Erskine, i. 7, 29, says that the office both of tutory and curatory expires by the marriage of a female tutor or curator.

I think the latest case in which this matter has been adverted to is that

¹ M. 9585.

² M. 9585.

³ 4 Br. Suppl. 277.

No. 185. of Campbell v. Maquay,¹ in which the late Lord President, in commenting on the 2d section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, said,—“It is said that that section must be read under reference to the common law, which makes it a disqualification for a mother to act as her child’s guardian if she marries a second time. The rule so decided is quite distinctly laid down in decisions pronounced in the 16th and 17th centuries, and it may truly be said that nothing has ever been done in later times to shake these authorities. But one cannot help seeing that these cases were founded, not on the principles of common law or equity, but entirely on the authority of the Roman law. The earliest of the decisions to which we were referred—the case of *Kerbechill*²—is particularly remarkable as illustrating that fact. It was argued that we should disregard these cases, as the spirit which inspired them is irreconcilable with the spirit of modern legal opinion. That is a somewhat dangerous doctrine to adopt, and I am not disposed to rest my judgment on that ground.”

July 10, 1897.
Chalmers’
Trustees v.
Sinclair.

I agree with the Lord President that nothing has been done in recent times to shake the authority of these cases. The only case to which we were referred as having done so was that of Stoddart,³ in which it was held that a married woman might legally be named a trustee. It was said that the reason of the thing applied equally to a married woman being a trustee as to her being a tutrix or curatrix. But the Court, in that case, distinguished between the two cases. Lord Glenlee, in particular, said,—“I conceive it to be fixed that, if a man means to make a married woman tutor or curator, he cannot do so. But it is quite a different matter to make her a trustee,” and he gives his reasons.

I agree with the Lord President that if that be, as I think, the old law of Scotland, we must follow it, whether or not we may think it irreconcilable with modern ideas of what is right and reasonable. I would only remark that the Legislature had a most appropriate opportunity of altering the law in that respect when they did so as regards the guardianship of pupils. Why they did not do so in the case of minors I do not know, but I am of opinion that we cannot do so.

I therefore think that the question should be answered in the negative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have found this question one of difficulty. I regret that, in the result, I have not been able to concur in the opinion which has been delivered by Lord Adam, and in which I understand your Lordship to agree. I can see no ground in reason, or in any principle of the law of Scotland, as it is now established, why a married woman should be disqualified for acting as the curator of her minor child. It is now settled by a series of decisions, which cannot be called in question, that a married woman may be a trustee, that she may be a tutor of pupil children, that she may be a factor loco tutoris or a curator bonis of a lunatic, and that she is not only entitled to the exclusive beneficial enjoyment of her own separate estate, but that she has the uncontrolled management and administration of it as fully and freely as an unmarried woman. I am unable to see any reason for holding that a person who is capable of administering her own affairs, and capable also of administering the estate of a pupil child or of a lunatic should be incapable of administering the estate of a minor. I agree that if there is a settled rule of positive law that a married woman cannot be a curator, we are bound to give effect to that rule, whatever we may think of its reason. But I am not satisfied that there is sufficient authority for holding that such a rule has been established, or now subsists. It is true that Mr Erskine says so, and the authority which was chiefly pressed upon us in argument was his statement of the law. I cannot regard his statement as authoritative, not only because it is, to say the least, very much shaken by the observations of Lord Meadowbank in the case of Stoddart,¹ but because his doctrine is applicable in terms to tutory as well as curatory; and it is certain that, in so far as the office of tutor is concerned, it is not now the law of Scotland. He says,²—"All persons may be appointed either tutors or curators to minors who are fit for the management of an estate, and are not debarred by law and custom. Tutory being accounted by the Romans officium virile could not be exercised by women, excepting mothers in special cases." Then he goes on to say,—“Married women are utterly disqualified for the office,” that obviously means for the office of tutor as well as for the office of curator. “For if it be, as Justinian reasons in a parallel case, a shameful confounding of names and things that the same person should be both tutor and minor, it must be equally absurd for one who is always subjected to the power or curatory of an husband to have another under her care and tuition. A father may name for tutors to his children either his own widow, or any other woman who is not married, and such nominee may lawfully exercise the office till she be vestita viro, and no longer, though the nomination should expressly provide the contrary.” Then he goes on to point out that certain other persons are equally disqualified, including Papists, and also all persons who are even suspected of popery. Now, it appears to me that if the statement that married women are incapable of the office of curator is still the law of Scotland, it is the only statement in that passage of which that can be said, because everything else is displaced by subsequent decision; and the doctrine which he lays down as the sole ground for the alleged disqualification is completely displaced. A married woman is not necessarily subject to the power or curatory of her husband. Mr Erskine’s statement of the law therefore appears to me to rest upon a statement of principle which cannot be assented to. It is not, I think, a statement of the law of Scotland, but a statement of the Roman law, and the authority which would otherwise belong to it as the doctrine of Mr Erskine is, I think, as I have already said, shaken by what was said in the case of Stoddart.¹

¹ 15 R. 784.

² M. 9585.

³ June 30, 1812, F. C.

If we are not to proceed solely upon Mr Erskine’s authority, is there any other authority of greater weight? Lord Adam referred to a dictum, I think, of Lord Glenlee in the case of Stoddart,¹ which is certainly entirely in accordance with his Lordship’s own opinion; but, in the first place, Lord Glenlee’s dictum was obiter, and, in the second place, it goes too far for the present purpose. For what his Lordship says is that he thinks that a married woman cannot be a tutor or curator, and there is no question that

No. 185.

July 10, 1897.
Chalmers’
Trustees v.
Sinclair.

¹ June 30, 1812, F. C.² Ersk. i. 7, 12.

No. 185. she may be a tutor. But then, further, his Lordship says that he conceives the case to be fixed by the decisions, and I must presume that the decisions to which he refers are those in the 16th century which have been cited to us—the case of *Kerbechill*¹ and the case of Stuart.² I think the judgment in the case of *Stoddart*³ itself is inconsistent with Mr Erskine's doctrine, and it was manifestly so held by the Judges, notwithstanding the saving clauses introduced into their opinions by Lord Glenlee and Lord Robertson. Because the question was whether a married woman's person was so sunk in marriage as to render her incapable of performing the functions of a trustee, and in support of that proposition the doctrine of Mr Erskine was cited. Lord Meadowbank says about that, that he holds that she is not incapable. He says,—“I see there is a doctrine of Justinian to that effect quoted by Mr Erskine, which he seems to have adopted very loosely. I don't know any authority for it in the law of Scotland. There may have been some feeling of that kind in the infancy of the law with regard to tutors and guardians, but that does not seem to have been countenanced at any time by the enlightened principles of the law of modern Europe. It was never the law of Scotland that a woman in Scotland lost her status because she chose to marry. There is no sinking of the rational person, as I understand, by marriage.” It is true that Lord Robertson indicates a contrary opinion. He says,—“In general, I think that marriage does create such an incapacity, and on this ground, that by our law the person of the wife is completely sunk. All deeds done by her without her husband's consent are void and null, and personal obligations undertaken by her, even with his consent, are null.” And for this last dictum the learned Judge might have cited, although he does not actually cite, the authority of Mr Erskine, who lays down the law in these terms. But then the question on which Lord Meadowbank and Lord Robertson were thus at variance in 1812, has now been finally settled by the judgment of this Court in Biggart v. The City of Glasgow Bank,⁴ in which it was held, after a very elaborate discussion of all the authorities, that the obligations of a married woman in the administration of her separate estate were just as valid and binding as the obligations of anybody else. Erskine's doctrine to the contrary was pressed upon the Court in a very learned speech by the late Lord Fraser, who was then Dean of Faculty, and his authority was disregarded on the express ground that his discussion as to the capacities and incapacities of a married woman was obsolete law, and no longer the law of Scotland. I cannot therefore regard this passage as an authority. Now, then, are the cases of *Kerbechill*¹ and *Stuart*² still law?—because these are the only authorities left, unless we are to consider the case of the *Marquis of Montrose*⁵ as an authority also. The late Lord President, in the case of Campbell v. Maquay,⁶ makes certain observations in regard to these decisions, which I am inclined to interpret somewhat differently from my learned brother Lord Adam,—“One cannot help seeing that those judgments are founded not on the principles of common law or equity, but entirely on the authority of the Roman law.”

¹ M. 9585.² June 30, 1812, F. C.³ 4 Br. Suppl. 277.⁴ M. 9585.⁵ 6 R. 470.⁶ 15 R. 784.

And then he goes on to observe,—“The earliest of the decisions to which we were referred, the case of Kerbechill,¹ is particularly remarkable as illustrating that fact.” It is quite true that when his Lordship proceeds to decide the case then before the Court, he prefers to rest his judgment upon what he thinks safer ground than that of the change of legal opinion since the case of *Kerbechill*¹ and the case of Stuart,² viz., on the Act of Parliament of 1886. He says that he thinks it would be a somewhat dangerous ground to hold that the decisions are to be disregarded merely because the spirit which inspired them is not reconcilable with the spirit of modern legal opinion. That certainly was a caution which was very natural for his Lordship to express in considering an argument such as had evidently been submitted to the Court in that case, and it was quite unnecessary for the Court to adopt any uncertain ground of judgment in the construction of an Act of Parliament, since there was a perfectly clear provision by the Legislature in the Act of 1886, which is entirely inconsistent with those decisions. Whether we are to disregard them merely because they are inconsistent with the spirit of modern legal opinion or not, I do not consider, but I think the basis on which they rest was, in the first place, never the law of Scotland, but only the law of Rome; and, in the next place that, in so far as it appears to have been incorporated into the law of Scotland by those decisions, it has been displaced by subsequent decision, and by subsequent legislation. It is quite true that the Guardianship of Infants Act of 1886 does not directly apply to the office of curator, but I do not think that any inference can be drawn from that circumstance unfavourable to the capacity of a married woman to act as a curator, because the direct purpose of that statute was not to remove incapacities, although as an incidental result of its provisions it was held that the incapacity of married women to act as tutors had been removed. Its purpose was to give the mother the absolute right to act as guardian in certain cases. Now, it may very well have been considered unnecessary or undesirable, in giving the mother new rights as the guardian of pupil children, to introduce any change into the law of Scotland with regard to curators and minors, which might have had the effect of depriving minors of the voice which they themselves had in the appointment of their own guardians. So that there is no reason in the limitation of that Act, considering what its purpose was, to the case of pupil children, that can possibly suggest an inference that the Legislature denied the capacity of married women to act as curators while allowing them to act as tutors. But it is true that the statute does not directly provide for the case of curators, and therefore we cannot decide this case upon the ground on which *Campbell v. Maquay*³ was decided; but then that decision displaces entirely the ground upon which, according to all the authorities cited, the incapacity of married women to act as curators is based, because it displaces the ground upon which the similar incapacity of married women to act as tutors is based. If there is no distinction with reference to its basis in law and reason between the alleged incapacity of a married woman in cases of tutory and in cases of curatory, then when the basis of the supposed disqualification in

No. 185.

July 10, 1897.
Chalmers’
Trustees v.
Sinclair.

¹ M. 9585.² M. 9585.³ 15 R. 784.

No. 185. the one case is displaced the similar disqualification in the other case is left without support. There is nothing in any of the decisions to suggest that there is any distinction between the capacity of a married woman for the office of a tutor and her capacity for the office of a curator, and if the reason as regards tutory is entirely displaced in the way it has been, why should the rule as regards curatory remain? But, on the other hand, if there is any distinction, then there is no authority against the capacity to act as curator, because all the cases cited were cases in which married women were held to be incapacitated for acting as tutors. Indeed, the first case of Kerbechill,¹ which my learned brother Lord Adam considers to be still law, was a case in which the nearest male agnate was held entitled to remove a pupil child from the custody of the mother because the mother had been married again, notwithstanding the fact that she had been appointed tutor by the father's testament. Now, that case had been directly disregarded long before the Guardianship of Infants Act was passed, in the case of, I think, McCallum v. Macdonald,² where the Court refused to ordain a married woman to give up the custody of a child, and proceeded in considering the question, not upon any doctrine of incapacity at all, but precisely upon the same grounds on which we are now in the habit of proceeding in considering applications for the custody of children, viz., what is best for the benefit of the child, leaving it a question for judicial discretion only, which the Court had perfect power to decide, according to what they thought was for the child's best interests, unrestricted by any arbitrary rule disqualifying the mother. I cannot therefore consider either that the case of *Kerbechill*¹ or the case of *Stuart*³ is now the law. In regard to the case of the Marquis of Montrose,⁴ I think that cannot be treated as an authority, because the question was not decided, or at all events, if decided, the final judgment has not been reported. I therefore come to the conclusion that there was no sufficient reason why this lady should not be allowed to continue to act as curator, but of course that is contrary to the opinion which Lord Adam has delivered. And although I am unable to agree in the judgment which he has given, I am very far from considering that the question is free from difficulty.

The LORD PRESIDENT.—I entirely concur in the opinion of Lord Adam.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 186.

GEORGE NELSON, Pursuer (Respondent.—D. Anderson.
JAMES IRVING, Defender (Appellant).—W. Hunter.

July 10, 1897.*
Nelson v.
Irving.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege.—A, the tenant of the shootings on a certain estate, complained to an innkeeper in the neighbourhood that poach-

¹ M. 9585.

² May 10, 1853, 15 D. 535.

³ M. 9585.

⁴ 4 Br. Suppl. 277.

* Decided July 7, 1897.

ing had been taking place on the estate, and the innkeeper promised to assist A in finding out who the poachers were. Thereafter the innkeeper was told by a gamekeeper that B had been poaching on the estate. The innkeeper communicated this information to A. No. 186.
July 10, 1897.
Nelson v.
Irving.

In an action of damages for slander brought by B against the innkeeper, held that in making this communication to A the defender was privileged.

IN February 1897, George Nelson, farm manager, Eaglesfield, in the parish of Middlebie, Dumfriesshire, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries against James Irving, hotel-keeper, Irving Arms Hotel, Kirtlebridge, praying for decree for £50 as damages for slander. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

The slander averred was that the defender, on 6th November 1896, told Mr William Clark Muir, tenant of the shootings of Blackwoodhouse, Eaglesfield, that the pursuer had been poaching on Blackwoodhouse.

The defence was privilege, the defender averring that prior to the date in question Mr Muir had frequently complained to defender about the poaching on Blackwoodhouse estate, and expressed to defender his desire to trace the poachers; that on the date in question, John Thompson, a gamekeeper with Major Irving of Burnfoot, Ecclefechan, called at defender's hotel, and in the course of conversation, stated to defender that the pursuer and another man named had been poaching on Blackwoodhouse; and that on the same day defender met Mr Muir and repeated to Mr Muir, in confidence, the information received from Thompson.

A proof was allowed. The defender, adduced as a witness by the pursuer, deponed,—“ I am tenant of the Irving Arms Hotel at Kirtlebridge, and have been so for a number of years. Mr Muir, the tenant of Blackwoodhouse, is in the habit of walking down to Kirtlebridge Station in the morning for the newspapers, and once in a while he drops into the hotel. I remember him coming from the station one morning with two friends from Glasgow, when he came forward and spoke to me, while his friends stood at the road-end. He had made frequent complaints about the trapping of rabbits on the estate, and said he wished very much that someone could give him a hint who was doing it. I had asked Thompson, the gamekeeper on Burnfoot, to try and find out for me who the parties were. I saw Thompson early in the forenoon of the day of which I have spoken, perhaps about an hour and a half before my meeting with Mr Muir. Thompson came to me on that occasion, and told me that he thought he had found out who had been poaching. I asked him then for the names, and he gave me them. One of them was the pursuer. He did not give the names just at the minute, but he did so shortly afterwards, when pursuer came out of one of the rooms of the hotel while we were talking . . . Thompson did not say that he had himself seen the men poaching. It was weeks before this that I asked him to find out if he could. Meeting Mr Muir shortly after the conversation with Thompson, I told him in confidence that I heard that the pursuer had been trapping rabbits, and that Thompson was my informant. I did not state to him that pursuer had been poaching on Blackwoodhouse estate, but simply repeated what Thompson had told me. I had not of my own knowledge any ground for suspecting pursuer of poaching.”

Muir deponed, adduced by defender,—“ I remember on 6th Novem-

No. 186. ber last being at Kirtlebridge Station. On the way back I passed defender's hotel. I saw defender on the road. There were two gentlemen with me. Seeing that defender apparently wished to speak to me, I went to him, leaving the other two at the parting of the roads close to the hotel. Defender asked me what about the game on Blackwoodhouse estate just now. I said it was very scarce. He said there had been a good deal of poaching going on as usual. I said Yes. He said,—‘I can give you the names of two parties who have been poaching.’ He gave me the names of ” pursuer and another man. “I asked, ‘Who told you?’ Defender said it was Thompson, one of Mr Irving’s gamekeepers. I said ‘All right; thank you,’ and went away On a subsequent occasion defender said, ‘I’ll send this man Thompson up to your house, and he will tell you himself.’ I said, ‘All right; send him up to me.’ . . . I had often complained to defender about the poaching, thinking he might have an opportunity of finding out who the parties might be, and he promised to try to assist me. I understood that he gave me that information as following on the request I had made. I had a call from Thompson. I took him into my sitting-room, and said,—‘Well, Mr Irving has sent you up.’ He said Yes. I said, ‘You know who have been poaching Blackwoodhouse estate.’ He said,—‘Oh, yes; quite well.’ I said,—‘Did you see Nelson and ’ the other man ‘poaching?’ He said,—‘Oh, no; I did not say to Mr Irving that I saw them, but I said I knew that they had been poaching.’”

There was no evidence that the pursuer had ever in fact been poaching.

On 2d April 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Finds (1) that the pursuer is farm manager to his brothers, who are postmasters and merchants at Eaglesfield, and that defender is an hotel-keeper, carrying on business at the Irving Arms Hotel, Kirtlebridge; and (2) that on or about 6th November 1896, near the Irving Arms Hotel, the defender made a statement to Mr William Clark Muir, tenant of Blackwoodhouse, to the effect that the pursuer had been poaching on the estate of Blackwoodhouse: Finds that said statement, thus made by the defender, of and concerning the pursuer, was false and calumnious, and that the defender was not protected by privilege; that in consequence of said statement the pursuer has suffered injury and damage to his feelings and reputation, and that the defender is liable to him in damages therefor: Assesses said damages at £15 sterling, for which sum decerns against defender,” &c.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The defender was privileged. The statement complained of was not mere idle gossip, but was a confidential communication made in response to a request for information by a person who had a right and interest to make inquiry and to receive information.¹ Even if the defender had misunderstood what Thompson told him, still, as he bona fide believed that he was doing no more than repeating what he understood Thompson to say, he did not lose his privilege.² Being, then, a case of privilege, malice was not to be presumed, but must be proved, and here malice had not been proved.

¹ Shaw v. Morgan, July 11, 1888, 15 R. 865; Jenoure v. Delmege, L. R. [1891], A. C. 73; Stuart v. Bell, L. R. [1891], 2 Q. B. 341; Coxhead v. Richards, 1846, 2 C. B. 569; Whiteley v. Adams, 1863, 15 C. B. (N. S.) 392.

² M'Lean v. Adam, Nov. 30, 1888, 16 R. 175.

Argued for the pursuer;—Assuming that the defender was privileged in communicating to Muir the information which he got from Thompson, that did not entitle him to communicate as fact what he had got as mere suspicion or rumour,¹ and that was what he did here. But the defender had no privilege in repeating mere rumours; what Muir wanted was facts, not rumours; no one was privileged in repeating mere gossip which would serve no useful purpose.² The defender's proper course was either to have sifted Thompson's information before passing it on to Muir—and very little further interrogation would have shewn that Thompson knew nothing against the pursuer—or the defender ought to have referred Muir to Thompson, or sent Thompson to Muir without mentioning the pursuer's name to Muir at all. But in saying to Muir as on the authority of Thompson that the pursuer had been poaching on Blackwoodhouse, the defender either was not privileged, or, what was the same thing in practical effect, had shewn such recklessness as in law amounted to malice.³

No. 186.

July 10, 1897.
Nelson v.
Irving.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I take this case on the footing that to accuse a man of poaching is defamatory. Poaching is an offence against the law of the land.

The facts here are plain enough in their general aspect. Muir asked the defender to get him information to aid him in ascertaining who had been poaching on his lands. The defender got the information, as he thought, from a gamekeeper Thompson, and told Muir what he had heard, and also told him who was his informant. He also told him he would send up the gamekeeper to see him.

It is true that the gamekeeper does not give evidence to quite the same effect as the defender with regard to what was said at their interview. But I may say that I am not very well satisfied as to the candour of Thompson's evidence. I feel justified in holding on the evidence that the defender only said to Muir what he was reasonably justified in saying in consequence of what the gamekeeper had said to him.

Now, the communication made by the defender to Muir was one in which Muir was properly interested. If an offence is committed against anyone, he is properly interested in discovering who has committed it. A communication made under such circumstances is prima facie privileged. In such a case a pursuer cannot succeed in obtaining damages because of a defamatory statement unless it can be proved that it was made maliciously,—that is, unless it be proved otherwise than by the mere fact that the defender has made a false and defamatory statement, which in the ordinary case is sufficient to infer malice. I think the Sheriff has erred here in holding that there was no privilege. But if the statement was privileged, then malice must be proved. Here there is no proof whatever of malice. It follows that the defender must be assolized.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. This case is one of general

¹ Maclean v. Adam, Nov. 30, 1888, 16 R. 175.

² Jenoure v. Delmage, L. R. [1891], A. C. 73, per Lord Macnaghten, p. 79; Stuart v. Bell, L. R. [1891], 2 Q. B. 341, per Lindley, L. J., at p. 350.

³ Lockhart v. Cumming, Feb. 7, 1852, 14 D. 452, 24 Scot. Jur. 223; Denholm v. Thomson, Oct. 22, 1880, 8 R. 31.

No. 186. importance,—I mean to say that I think what we are deciding will be of importance in considering cases of slander in the future.

July 10, 1897.
Nelson v.
Irving.

The pursuer here sues an innkeeper in a country district for saying that he was a poacher. The defender was applied to by the shooting tenant of a small estate to get information for him as to who were poaching his rabbits. The innkeeper applied to the gamekeeper on a property adjoining that occupied by the shooting tenant. The gamekeeper came to the defender and said (I am taking that as proved) "that he thought he had found out who had been poaching," and gave the name of the pursuer. Then the defender informed Muir that the pursuer was one of the persons who were poaching his rabbits. He also said that he would send Thompson, the gamekeeper, up to see Muir in order that he might tell what he knew himself, and he did so.

I think this was a privileged occasion,—that is to say, the occasion was such as to exclude the presumption of malice which arises from making any defamatory statement. When a statement is made in circumstances which shew that there was any moral or social duty to make the statement, the presumption of malice is excluded. The word privilege is an unfortunate one. It is apt to convey an erroneous impression. No one is privileged to slander another, but a defamatory statement may be made under such circumstances that the malice which is essential to slander is not to be inferred simply from the defamatory statement having been made. This is all that is meant by privilege. I think that the law on this subject is very well stated in the case of Stuart v. Bell,¹ which was referred to in the course of the argument, by Lord Justice Lindley, who gave the leading opinion. That case is the more interesting as shewing how the law is progressing in the direction of holding more occasions privileged than was formerly the case. Mr Justice Wills directed the jury that the occasion was not privileged. This ruling was reversed by the Court of Appeal on the grounds explained by Lord Justice Lindley. He says,—“This is an action for slander. At the time when the slander was uttered the plaintiff was a valet in the employ of Mr Stanley. Mr Stanley was the guest of the defendant, who was the Mayor of Newcastle. The plaintiff was staying with his master at the Mansion-house at Newcastle. They had come from Edinburgh, and were going on further visits. Whilst Stanley and the plaintiff were still at the Mansion-house at Newcastle, the Chief Constable of that town received from the Chief Constable of Edinburgh a letter to the effect that a lady who had been staying at the same hotel as the plaintiff had lost a gold watch, and that suspicion had fallen on the plaintiff as the person who stole it. The Chief Constable of Newcastle sent this letter to the defendant, who read it and returned it, and then told Stanley privately what I have above stated.” This was the slander complained of, and the Court of Appeal, reversing the judgment of Mr Justice Wills, held that it was uttered on a privileged occasion. Lord Justice Lindley quotes and approves what Chief Justice Erle said in the case of Whiteley v. Adams,² which was an action for libel on two letters. Chief Justice Erle said,—“Each of these letters contains matter which is clearly defamatory of the plaintiff, and

¹ L. R. [1891], 2 Q. B. 341.

² 15 C. B. (N. S.) 392.

No. 186.

July 10, 1897.

Nelson v.

Irving.

forms the foundation of an action, unless the circumstances under which it is written bring it within the protection afforded by the law to what are called privileged communications. I take it to be clear that the foundation for an action of defamation is malice." I may say that I have frequently had occasion, both when I was at the bar and also since I came on to the bench, to point out—not invariably I must admit with success—that malice is essential to slander, that is, malice either presumed or proved. I desire to emphasise what Chief Justice Erle, approved by Lord Justice Lindley, lays down:—"I take it to be clear that the foundation of an action of defamation is malice." He then goes on—"But defamation pure and simple affords presumptive evidence of malice. That presumption may be rebutted by shewing that the circumstances under which the libel was written or the words uttered were such as to render it justifiable. The rule has been laid down in the Court of Exchequer, and again lately in the Court of Queen's Bench, that if the circumstances bring the Judge to the opinion that the communication was made in the discharge of some social or moral duty, or on the ground of an interest in the party making or receiving it, then if the words pass in the honest belief on the part of the persons writing or uttering them, he is bound to hold that the action fails." Then he describes the facts of the case and goes on:—"Judges who have had from time to time to deal with questions as to whether the occasion justified the speaking or the writing of defamatory matter, have all felt great difficulty in defining what kind of social or moral duty, or what amount of interest, will afford a justification; but all are clear that it is a question for the Judge to decide." Then he goes on to say that "the rule has since become gradually more extended, upon the principle that it is to the general interest of society that correct information should be obtained as to the character of the persons in whom others have an interest. If every word that was uttered to the discredit of another is to be made the ground of an action, cautious persons will take care that all their words are words of praise only, and will cease to obey the dictates of truth." Then Lord Justice Lindley says, referring to the facts in the case of Stuart v. Bell,¹—"Under these circumstances I am clearly of opinion that it was the defendant's moral or social, though not legal, duty to communicate to Stanley the information which the defendant had received . . . Suppose the suspicion which had fallen on the plaintiff had been well founded, and not ill founded, and that the defendant had withheld the information from Stanley, could the defendant have morally justified reticence? I answer No; he would not have been acting up to his duty either to the public or to Stanley. Suppose the plaintiff had proved dishonest at the next place he visited, would the defendant then have been free from moral blame if he had not communicated to Stanley what he had learned from the police? In my opinion the defendant would then have been greatly to blame if he had held his tongue. The question of moral or social duty being for the Judge, each Judge must decide it as best he can himself. I take moral or social duty to mean a duty recognised by English people of ordinary intelligence and moral principle, but at the same time not a duty enforceable by legal proceedings, whether civil or criminal."

¹ L. R. [1891], 2 Q. B. 341.

No. 186.

July 10, 1897.
Nelson v.
Irving.

I assent to that. I think it is the interest of the public that people should not be deterred from giving relatives or friends correct information on matters which concern them by fear of an action of damages for slander. I think it is not for the public interest that fathers or uncles or friends should be deterred from saying to sons or daughters, or nephews or younger friends, that a person with whom they see those they are interested in associating, and of whose character they do not approve, is not a proper friend for them to have, and from warning them against frequenting that person's company. I think it is for the public interest that they should have full freedom to give such advice and such warnings without fear of having an action brought against them.

I have made these observations quite generally and without any special reference to the particular facts of this case, although I think that here also the presumption that false and defamatory statements are malicious does not apply. As the presumption does not apply, it lies upon the pursuer to prove malice. I think he has not done so. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute should be recalled, and that with the appropriate findings in fact which we are bound by the statute to make in this case, we should assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I am sure your Lordships will concur with me in saying that nothing we are deciding in this case is to be construed into an approval of anyone ultroneously repeating defamatory statements which he has heard, but into the truth of which he has not inquired. If a man goes about recklessly spreading defamatory reports regarding another which are not true he will be responsible for such statements. But we have not such a case here. The defender was asked by Mr Muir if he could inform him or could find out who had been poaching his rabbits, a matter in which Mr Muir was interested. The defender did make inquiry of a person who was likely to be able to afford the desired information, and he got an answer which he communicated to Mr Muir. I think the evidence shews that what Thompson the gamekeeper told the defender was that the pursuer was poaching. The defender privately communicated to Mr Muir what he had heard from Thompson, and that communication was, I think, privileged.

It is said that the defender repeated as a fact of which he had knowledge what he got from Thompson as mere hearsay or rumour. I do not think he did, but if he had made a statement to Muir which was somewhat incautiously worded in view of all the information he had got, it would not have altered my judgment. I think in the circumstances the defender was privileged in making the statement he made to the person to whom he made it. If there was privilege, then malice, which is necessarily the basis of an action of slander, and in the ordinary case is presumed, must be proved. Here I think the idea of malice is not only not supported by the evidence but is rebutted by it. The defender was not acting recklessly, and there is no ground whatever for supposing that he was actuated by any personal ill will against the pursuer.

I think it fair to the pursuer to add that there is no room, in my opinion, on the evidence before us, for believing that the pursuer was a poacher, nor any reason for suspecting him of poaching. No. 186.

I concur in thinking that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment should be recalled, and the defender assoilzied.

July 10, 1897.
Nelson v.
Irving.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact (1) that the pursuer is the farm manager to his brothers, who are postmasters and merchants at Eaglesfield, and that defender is an hotel-keeper, carrying on business at the Irving Arms Hotel, Kirtlebridge; (2) that Mr William Clark Muir, tenant of the estate of Blackwoodhouse, had complained to the defender about poaching taking place on said estate, and that defender promised to assist him in finding out who the parties were; (3) that the defender received a communication from John Thompson, gamekeeper, Birnam Cottage, that he had been told who had been poaching on said estate, and that pursuer and another were the parties who had done so, and that defender told Mr Muir what had been communicated to him by said John Thompson, and gave him the name of his informant; (4) that said statement of and concerning the pursuer was false and calumnious, but that under the circumstances the defender in making said statement was privileged: Therefore assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find him entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court," &c.

JAMES A. B. HORN, S.S.C.—THOMAS M. HORSEBURGH, S.S.C.—Agents.

PETER JOHNSTON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Balfour—Rankine—Wilton. No. 187.

THE WALKER TRUSTEES, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston—Cook.

MISS EMMA HOFFORD AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—

Johnston—Cook.

July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

Superior and Vassal—Restrictions imposed by common superior—Right of one vassal to enforce restrictions against another—Jus quæsitum tertio.—A feu-charter granted by the superior of all the feus in a street provided "that as the tenement built on said area has been erected in strict conformity to the plan and elevation adopted for" the street "(and the plan and elevation of the said tenement now subscribed by" the superior and feuar "as relative hereto) . . . it shall not be in the power of the said" feuar "or his foresaids to convert the said dwelling-house and others hereby disposed into a shop or shops or warerooms for the sale of goods or merchandise of any description, but that they shall be bound to use the same as a dwelling-house only."

The charter also contained provisions relative to the use of a pleasure-ground in front of the feus, and to the formation and maintenance of sewers, inferring community of interest and obligation among the feuars with regard thereto, and also a provision that the superior should have power to alter any of the proposed plans and streets and lanes upon the ground belonging to him, and not built upon at the date of granting the respective feu-rights thereof. The provisions were declared to be real burdens, and were appointed to be inserted in all future investitures.

Held, in a question between the feuar and other feuars in the street, whose charters contained similar provisions and references to the feuing-

No. 187. plan, that the reference to a common plan and scheme of building in the feu-charter was sufficient to shew that the restrictions were imposed and accepted for the benefit not merely of the superior, but also of the body of feuars, and that the other feuars were entitled to enforce them.

July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

Property—Superior and Vassal—Restrictions imposed in feu-charter—Acquiescence.—All the feuars in a street held of a common superior under titles which prohibited them from making any deviation from the plan and elevation adopted for the street, and from converting the subjects feued by them into shops or warerooms for the sale of goods, and bound them to use their subjects as dwelling-houses only.

In 1896 the proprietor of the sunk and street flats of the corner tenement raised an action to have it declared that the clauses of restriction had been departed from and could no longer be enforced, and that in any view he was not bound to use his subjects as a dwelling-house only.

It was proved (1) that after the houses in the street had been erected in conformity with the plan dormer windows had been—from time to time—added to twelve of them, including the corner tenement, and a complete storey to three of them; (2) with regard to the pursuer's own subjects, that these had, without objection on the part of anyone, been used from 1871 to 1884 as writing chambers by a firm of law-agents; and (3) that these subjects had been used from 1884 onwards as a shop or wareroom for the sale of millinery, costumes, and other goods, but only under a strong protest and threatened action by the co-feuars with the approval of the superior, followed by a letter from the feuar agreeing that their abstention from proceedings should not be construed into consent or approval. The Court, holding that the restrictions were still binding, assolized the defenders.

Stewart v. Buntin, July 20, 1878, 5 R. 1108, followed.

1st Division.
Ld. Kyllachy.

By feu-charter, dated May 1859, Miss Mary Walker, of Coates, disposed to and in favour of George John Murray, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, "All and Whole that dwelling-house, marked 22, in Coates Crescent, Edinburgh, and consisting of the street and sunk flats of the corner tenement erected at the south end of Manor Place and west end of Coates Crescent, on that area or piece of ground, consisting of 51 feet 6 inches or thereby, in front to Coates Crescent . . . as also right in common with the whole other feuars from me or my predecessors or successors, of areas or stances in Coates Crescent, to the space or area of pleasure-ground in front of the street way of said crescent, now enclosed with a parapet wall and iron railing, and that as a common property of the feuars in the said crescent . . . But it is hereby expressly provided and declared that the foresaid dwelling-house and others, with the privileges and pertinents thereof, are hereby disposed . . . under the burden of a proportional part of the expense, along with the other feuars, of keeping the common sewer, and the causeway, and the surface drains and gratings, in perpetual repair . . . and it is also provided and declared that the foresaid area or pleasure-ground in front of the said crescent shall be used allenarly for pleasure or other accommodation of the several feuars and their families, but shall nowise be converted into a common thoroughfare, and that the said space, with the parapet-walls, railings, entries, gravel walks, trees, and grass ground, shall be made, preserved, and kept in order and repair at the common and rateable expense of the whole feuars." It was further declared that the sewer should remain the property of the superior for the benefit of all concerned.

The deed further expressly provided and declared,—“That as the tenement built on the said area has been erected in strict conformity to the plan and elevation adopted for Coates Crescent and Manor

Place, and the plan and elevation of the said tenement now subscribed No. 187. by me and the said George John Murray as relative hereto, with balconies and iron railings on both fronts thereof, conform to the pattern adopted for said crescent and place, it shall not be in the power of the said George John Murray or his foresaids to convert the said dwelling-house and others hereby disposed into a shop or shops or warerooms for the sale of goods or merchandise of any description, but that they shall be bound to use the same as a dwelling-house only ; and, further, that it shall not be in the power of my said disponee or his foresaids to erect or make common stairs or separate tenements within the said house, nor to make any deviation from, or alteration upon, the plans and elevations and pattern balconies and iron railings before mentioned . . . And it is hereby expressly provided and declared that I and my foresaids shall have full power and liberty to vary or alter any of the proposed plans and streets or lanes upon the ground belonging to me, and not already built upon or feued, or as I or they shall think fit . . . which whole burdens, conditions, and provisions herein contained are hereby declared to be real burdens affecting the said subjects before disposed, and are as such appointed to be verbatim engrossed or validly referred to in all the future charters and investitures and writs whatsoever of the said subjects."

July 10, 1897.
 Johnston v.
 The Walker
 Trustees.

In April 1896 Peter Johnston, who carried on business as a coach-builder in Edinburgh, and who had acquired the subjects No. 22 Coates Crescent, presented an application to the Dean of Guild for authority to make certain alterations for the purpose of enabling him to use the premises as a carriage saloon. The application having been opposed, proceedings were sisted to enable Mr Johnston to bring the present action.

Accordingly, on 28th May 1896, Mr Johnston raised the present action against (1) the Walker Trustees, the superiors ; (2) the Misses Hofford, and the other proprietors of flats above the pursuer's premises ; and (3) the Misses Cook, proprietors of No. 21 Coates Crescent.

The conclusions of the action were for declarator that "notwithstanding the terms of" the feu-charter above referred to, "the pursuer, as heritable proprietor of the subjects No. 22 Coates Crescent, Edinburgh, with the parts and pertinents thereof, thereby feued, in the first place is not bound to use the same as a dwelling-house only, and in the second place is entitled to possess and occupy the same as a shop or wareroom, or to convert the same into a shop or wareroom, and to possess and occupy them as such ; and it should also be found and declared by decree of our said Lords that any conditions, restrictions, or prohibitions in the said feu-charter limiting the pursuer in his use of the said subjects as a dwelling-house only, or preventing him from possessing and occupying the same as a shop or wareroom, converting the same into a shop or wareroom, and possessing and occupying them as such, have been departed from, and that the defenders and the said other parties, or any one of them, have no right or title to enforce the said conditions, restrictions, or prohibitions against the pursuer."

The pursuer, after setting forth the terms of his feu-charter, averred that "notwithstanding the said provision and declaration, the subjects belonging to the pursuer have wholly ceased for many years back to be used for residential purposes." That from 1871 to 1884 the pursuer's property had been occupied as writing chambers

No. 187.

July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

by a firm of Writers to the Signet, and that none of the partners had resided there, and that no objection had been taken by the superiors or the other proprietors; that in 1884 the pursuer's predecessor, John Aitken, had acquired the subjects, and had since occupied them as a millinery shop or warehouse without objection till Whitsunday 1896, when the pursuer got possession. Further, that the superiors had consented to or permitted material deviations from the plans by allowing dormer windows to be erected on the roofs of various houses mentioned, and by allowing storeys to be added to some of the houses, and that the other proprietors had also acquiesced.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The restrictions condescended upon in the feu-charter referred to having been departed from by the consent or acquiescence of all parties having an interest in the enforcement thereof, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for, with expenses. (2) The defenders, the Walker Trustees, as superiors, having acquiesced in the occupation and use of the said subjects as condescended upon, are now barred by personal exception from insisting upon compliance by the pursuer with the said restrictions, and separatim, having now no interest to insist upon the preservation of the said restrictions, the pursuer quoad them is entitled to decree of declarator, with expenses. (3) The said defenders having, as condescended upon, consented to or permitted material deviations from and alterations upon the general plan and elevation referred to in the said feu-charter, are not now entitled to enforce observance of the relative restrictions as to use or conversion in the pursuer's title. (4) The defenders, proprietors of subjects in the same tenement as the pursuer's property, either as having no title to insist upon the pursuer's compliance with the said restrictions, or, if having such a title, as being now barred from maintaining the same by their acquiescence in the conversion of the said subjects, have no right to resist the decree of declarator craved by the pursuer. (5) The proprietors of adjoining properties having no jus quæsitum in the enforcement of the said restrictions against the pursuer, and even if they had such a right, the same having been lost by their acquiescence in the said conversion, or in any event by their failure to take any steps in vindication of such right, the pursuer quoad them is entitled to decree of declarator as craved. (6) In any event the whole of the defenders are barred from objecting to the pursuer's using the said subjects as an office, and he is entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the first alternative of the leading conclusion of the summons.

Defences were lodged for the Walker Trustees, the superiors, the Misses Hofford, and the Misses Cook.

The Walker Trustees, the superiors, pleaded;—(3) By the terms of his titles derived from these defenders, the pursuer is prohibited from making the alterations he proposes upon his property, and from converting it to and occupying it as a carriage showroom. (4) The alteration on and occupation of his property proposed by the pursuer being in violation of the terms of his titles, and these defenders never having acquiesced in the abandonment on the part of their vassals of the conditions and restrictions contained in their feu-charters, are entitled to absolvitor.

The other defenders pleaded;—(3) These defenders, in virtue of their titles and in virtue of the conditions and restrictions contained in the titles of the pursuer and their other co-feuars under the Walker Trustees, are entitled to insist on the fulfilment by the pursuer of the conditions and restrictions in his charter. (4) The right to insist upon such fulfilment never having been abandoned by these defenders or their predecessors in title, and there never having been any acquiescence on their part in any alleged deviation from said conditions and restrictions, at all events as regards the occupation and use of the subjects, these defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

No. 187.
July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

A proof was allowed. The parties subsequently lodged a joint minute of admissions and renounced probation.

The following statement is taken from the joint minute:—The tenement, of which the pursuer's property formed part, was built about 1825, but no charter was granted until the feu-charter of 14th May 1859. The defenders other than the Walker Trustees were duly vested in their respective properties, and held of the same superiors as the pursuer. The titles of the pursuer, of the defenders Misses Cook, and of the other proprietors in Coates Crescent of their respective properties therein, contained clauses of prohibition against the use thereof otherwise than as dwelling-houses only, and against making any deviation or alteration upon the plan and elevation adopted for Coates Crescent, and pattern balconies and iron railings in front of such subjects, in terms substantially identical. All such titles also contained provisions relative to the pleasure-ground in Coates Crescent and to the formation and maintenance of the sewers, inferring community of interest and obligation among the feuars with regard thereto. All such titles also contained a clause providing and declaring that the superiors should have power to vary or alter any of the proposed plans and streets and lanes upon the ground belonging to them and not built upon at the time of granting the respective feu-rights thereof. In the feu-charter, dated 11th May 1854, in favour of the author of the defenders Misses Hofford, there was inserted a clause obliging the superiors to observe the prohibitions in reference to the remaining parts of the said tenement of which the pursuer's property forms part, and to insert the said prohibitions in the feu-charters of the tenement, or of parts thereof, that might be thereafter granted by them in so far as the same might be applicable thereto. The whole of the areas known as Coates Crescent and Manor Place was built upon at the date of the feu-charter.

From 1871 to 1884 No. 22 Coates Crescent was owned by Messrs Dalgleish & Bell, W.S., and occupied by them as writing chambers. The partners of the firm occupied the subjects during the day as writing chambers, but they did not sleep on the premises. They maintained resident caretakers (a man and his wife), who occupied the basement portion of the subjects, and the defenders the Walker Trustees were aware of, but did not take any steps to prevent, this use of the subjects. No change was made upon the house internally or externally during Messrs Dalgleish & Bell's ownership and occupancy thereof, except that upon the front door, which was kept shut, they placed a brass plate upon which was engraved "Messrs Dalgleish & Bell, W.S."

At or about Whitsunday 1884 John Aitken, the immediate author of the pursuer, acquired the subjects in question from Messrs Dalgleish & Bell, and immediately thereafter began to use the same as a shop or wareroom for the sale of millinery, mantles, costumes, and other goods, which he advertised in the newspapers by the name of "Manor House," and in circulars addressed to residents in Edinburgh as "Private showrooms for millinery, mantles, and costumes."

No. 187. Several of the proprietors in Coates Crescent objected to such use of the subjects by John Aitken, and two meetings of such proprietors in connection therewith (at the first of which the agent of the superiors was present as representing their interests) were held on 23d December 1884, and 16th January 1885. Thereafter a correspondence took place between Mr Aitken and his agent, Mr Lockhart Thomson, S.S.C., on the one side, and a committee of proprietors in Coates Crescent, and Mr Ralph Richardson, W.S., their agent, on the other, and in respect of this correspondence, and of a letter from Mr Aitken of 16th March 1885, a copy of which was sent to the Walker Trustees, no legal proceedings were then taken.*

July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

The general feuing-plan of Manor Place and Coates Crescent referred to in the titles of the pursuer and of the defenders Misses Cook and Misses Hofford had been lost.

The following deviations or alterations upon the general plan in conformity with which the houses in Manor Place and Coates Crescent were originally erected had been made and existed for many years, viz., three dormer or attic windows had been added to the roof of the tenement of which No. 22 Coates Crescent formed part; two dormer windows had been made in the roofs of the dwelling-houses, Nos. 4, 6, 7, 9, 10, 13, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 Coates Crescent; and in the case of the dwelling-houses, Nos. 8, 14, and 15 Coates Crescent, complete storeys had been added to their front elevation, the additional storey of No. 8 consisting wholly of a stone front, and the additional storey of Nos. 14 and 15 consisting chiefly of timber fronts.

The agents of the pursuer were notified previous to his purchase of the subjects by the agents of the superiors, the Walker Trustees, and by the agents of the defenders the Misses Cook, that any intended use of the subjects for trade purposes would be objected to as an infringement of the feu-charter, and the pursuer's agents were also informed that proceedings had not been taken to prevent such occupation during Mr Aitken's time in consequence of the undertaking of 16th March 1885.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 7th January 1897, assoilzied the compearing defenders.†

* "Gentlemen,—I address you as a committee representing the proprietors of houses in Coates Crescent, with reference to the intimated objection to my using my own house, No. 22 Coates Crescent, as a place of business.

"It is certainly not my intention to utilise my property in any way that can be construed into a nuisance, as I have as much interest as any other proprietor in preserving the amenity of the crescent.

"While I am advised that I am acting quite within my rights in using my property as I am now doing, I have no hesitation in recording that, if the objecting proprietors abstain from pressing their objections so long as I occupy and use the house as I am now doing, I bind and oblige myself that it will not afterwards be pled as acquiescence on their part, and that the respective rights of parties shall in no way be prejudiced thereby. That is to say, it will be quite open to any of the proprietors to adopt whatever proceedings they may be advised to take to have their legal rights determined, without my pleading that their being at present passive be construed into consent or approval."

† "OPINION.— . . . The points which I have to decide are, I think, sufficiently raised in the pleadings, and appear to be these (1) have the co-feuars on a just construction of the titles, a title to enforce the restriction? (2) have they barred themselves from doing so by what is called acqui-

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The superior had no interest No. 187.
to enforce the restriction. His only interest was to protect his feuduty, and it could not be seriously suggested that that would be imperilled. The feuars had no title. It was settled that the fact of the same conditions appearing in feu-charters, derived from a common superior, even when coupled with a substantial interest in their observance, did not confer a right upon any one feuar to enforce them against another.¹ There was nothing else in the titles here to confer mutuality of rights and obligations among the feuars, either expressly or by implication.² There was no obligation by the superior in any of the titles to take the other feuars bound,³ nor had the titles of the feuars a common origin as in the case of Robertson.⁴ The superior, on the other hand, had reserved a right to dispense with conformity to the plans, and that was itself sufficient to negative the existence of mutuality among the feuars.⁵ The defenders the Misses Hofford were not even members of the Coates Crescent community. They belonged to Manor Place, and their title contained no reference at all to the pleasure-grounds. The plan referred to in their title

July 10, 1897.
Johnston v. The Walker Trustees.

escence? (3) have the superiors (whose title is not disputed) so barred themselves? (4) has the acquiescence by the defenders been such as in any view to bar enforcement of the condition that the premises shall be used 'as a dwelling-house only'?

"The first of these questions, in the view I take, is not perhaps necessary to the decision of the dispute. For if the superiors have a title and are not barred, the title of the co-feuars is, as regards the actual controversy, immaterial. But the action being a declarator to determine generally the rights of parties, and it being always possible that the superiors and co-feuars may not always, as now, act in concert, I do not see how I can avoid deciding whether, as against the co-feuars, the pursuer is or is not entitled to the declarator which he asks. Now in this view the question raised is, I think, both important and difficult. It stands, I think, thus. There is no doubt that the restriction in controversy is common to all the feus in Coates Crescent,—at least to all the feus held of the Walker Trustees. But the question is, whether there is sufficient evidence deducible from the titles of parties, and in particular from the titles of the pursuer, that the restrictions in controversy were imposed, and accepted as being imposed, for the benefit, not merely of the superiors, but of the body of feuars. That is, I think, according to the judgment in MacRitchie's Trustees v. Hislop, 7 R. 384, the point to be settled.

"Now, it is certain that there are not here present either of the indicia which are instanced by Lord Watson in that case as sufficient for the purpose. The feuars, including the pursuer, do not each of them stipulate with the superiors that the conditions to which they submit shall be imposed upon them all. Neither is this a case where the titles of all the feuars have a common origin, as, e.g., where the entire subject has been feued off to a building company, who are bound to insert in their subfeus or dispositions identical conditions. The case therefore is not within the category of M'Gibbon v. Rankin, 9 Macph. 423, on the one hand, or of Robertson v. North British Railway Co., 1 R. 1213, on the other. But the question is,

¹ Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1879, 7 R. 384, revd. June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95.

² North British Railway Co. v. Moore, July 1, 1891, 18 R. 1021.

³ M'Gibbon v. Rankin, Jan. 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 423, 43 Scot. Jur. 205.

⁴ Robertson v. North British Railway Co., July 18, 1874, 1 R. 1213.

⁵ Turner v. Hamilton, Feb. 21, 1890, 17 R. 494.

No. 187. was the plan of Manor Place, not of Coates Crescent. Besides, to have the effect contended for by the defenders, a plan must be made part of the contract. It was not enough merely to exhibit it. Here a plan was not referred to in any of the titles to found a stipulation or agreement. In any view, the defenders were barred by acquiescence. The pursuer's property had for years been occupied otherwise than as a dwelling-house, and the defenders had stood by and not interfered. The use of the subjects as writing chambers was just as clear a departure from the restriction as use as a shop. But the use as a shop had also gone on for many years with nothing more than a protest from some of the feuars. Whether the acquiescence amounted to abandonment was a jury question.¹ The author of the Misses Hofford had herself made purchases in the shop. There could be no stronger case of acquiescence than that.² The superior, moreover, had done nothing even in the way of protest, and had therefore released the pursuer, if not the other feuars, from the restriction.³ The deviations from the original design of the buildings was very marked, and the superior could not now intervene.⁴

July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

after all, as to the sufficiency of evidence—evidence no doubt to be gathered by reasonable implication from the terms of the titles—but still a question of evidence. And what I have here to consider really is, whether, to put the point as put by the Lord Chancellor in MacRitchie's case, there is not here, in the pursuer's title as in the other titles, such a 'reference to a common plan or scheme of building,' as reasonably implies that each feuar consented to be bound not merely to his superiors, but to his co-feuars.

"Now although the point is narrow and difficult, and I am far from confident that I am right in the view which I have come to take, I am disposed to be of opinion that there is in the pursuer's feu-contract, as well as in those of the defenders', a sufficient reference to a common plan and scheme of building, a reference, that is to say, sufficient to afford the necessary evidence of consent to a mutual servitude. The feuars are not, it is true, taken bound in terms to conform to a common plan or scheme of building. But the clause of restriction which is in question, and which as I have said is common to all the feus, starts in each case with a reference to 'the plan and elevation adopted for Coates Crescent and Manor Place'; and sets out as the reason for the restriction that the tenement (or dwelling-house) built on the area feued has 'been erected in strict conformity' with that plan and elevation. Moreover each feu-contract contains provisions with respect, e.g., to pleasure-ground, sewers, &c., which seem plainly to point to a common scheme of residential building; and also other provisions as to the rights of the superiors over their unbuilt upon ground, which, by implication, seem to restrict the superiors from making or consenting to any change with respect to their ground (like Coates Crescent) already built upon. Altogether the inference is, I think, legitimate and fairly strong that as to elevation and external structure, the restrictions in question were imposed and accepted as for the common benefit; and, if that be once assumed, it is not I think specially difficult to extend the inference to the conditions as to use and occupation, which are introduced in the same clause, and as ancillary (which they fairly are) to the other conditions.

"On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the co-feuars have a title to

¹ Glover v. Coleman, 1874, L. R., 10 C. P. 108.

² Sayers v. Collyer, 1884, L. R., 28 Ch. Div. 103, at 107.

³ German v. Chapman, 1877, L. R., 7 Ch. Div. 271.

⁴ Campbell v. Clydesdale Banking Co., June 19, 1868, 6 Macph. 943, 40 Scot. Jur. 539; Fraser v. Downie, June 22, 1877, 4 R. 942.

Argued for the defenders ;—The title of the superior to enforce the restrictions arose ex contractu, and it was not necessary for him to qualify a direct patrimonial interest.¹ The feuars also had a right to enforce them. Building restrictions were presumably inserted for the benefit of the co-feuars. Here the feuars had contracted with reference to, and in reliance on, a common plan or scheme of building. That was sufficient to infer mutuality.² The right to vary the plan reserved to the superior was of a very restricted nature, and really made for the defenders, for once a dwelling-house was up the superior's right to alter ceased. Then, again, mutuality, both of obligation and of right, was apparent throughout the titles, e.g., the burden of maintaining the sewers, and the right to the pleasure-grounds. The corner tenement was really within the Coates Crescent community. There had been no acquiescence on the part either of the superior or of the feuars. There had been nothing of the nature of rei interventus,³ and no agreement had been entered into. The deviations founded on by the pursuer were not material, and could not be held to infer total abandonment of the restrictions.⁴ The use as writing chambers was

No. 187.

July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

object to the pursuer's operations, and to resist his obtaining decree in terms of the summons.

"The second and third questions, which turn on the effect of alleged acquiescence, may be taken together ; and the acquiescence is said to consist (1) in permitting without objection the erection—contrary to the terms of the titles—of what are called storm windows, in the roofs of certain of the houses in Coates Crescent ; (2) in permitting the use and occupation of what is now the pursuer's house for thirteen years as writing chambers, and for twelve years as millinery showrooms.

"With respect to the storm windows, my view may be stated shortly. One of course recognises the doctrine of the cases of Campbell v. Clydesdale Bank, 6 Macph. 943, and Fraser v. Downie, 4 R. 942. That doctrine is, that wherever in a feuing area some building restriction imposed for the general benefit has been generally contravened, and the contravention is past challenge, the restriction so placed in abeyance can no longer be enforced in individual cases either by the superior or co-feuars. But it has never, so far as I know, been held that because one building restriction has, by common consent, been abandoned, that involves an abandonment of all building restrictions, and in particular of other and different restrictions, which are, or may be, of much greater importance. Indeed, the contrary has been decided more than once—Stewart v. Bunten, 5 R. 1108. Accordingly, while it may be that the pursuer, if he owned the roof of this tenement, could, if he chose, throw out storm windows like his neighbours, I cannot hold that acquiescence in a contravention of that sort by some of the neighbours bars the defenders, or any of them, from now objecting to a contravention of a quite different kind, viz., the conversion of the pursuer's dwelling-house into a shop or warehouse.

"With respect again to the use and occupation of the pursuer's own premises,—which occupation is said to have been permitted for twelve years—there appear to be several difficulties in the pursuer's way. In the first

¹ Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Macfarlane, Dec. 2, 1857, 20 D. 156, 30 Scot. Jur. 86 ; Earl of Zetland v. Hislop, June 12, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 40, at 47.

² Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1879, 7 R. 384, revd. June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95.

³ Muirhead v. Glasgow Highland Society, Jan. 15, 1864, 2 Macph. 420, 36 Scot. Jur. 201.

⁴ Stewart v. Bunten, July 20, 1878, 5 R. 1108.

No. 187. of a wholly different character from use as a shop, and had not necessitated structural alterations of any sort. The use as a shop had been vigorously objected to, and the rights of the feuars safeguarded by the letter of 16th March 1885.

July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer is proprietor of the house No. 22 Coates Crescent. The original feu-charter granted by Miss Walker of Coates in favour of his predecessor in title, George John Murray, which is dated in May 1859, contains a clause in the following terms :—“It is hereby expressly provided and declared, that as the tenement built on the said area has been erected in strict conformity to the plan and elevation adopted for Coates Crescent and Manor Place, and the plan and elevation of said tenement now subscribed by me and the said George John Murray as relative hereto, with balconies and iron railings on both fronts thereof, conform to the pattern adopted for said crescent and place, it shall not be in the power of the said George John Murray or his foresaids to convert the said dwelling-house place, it is difficult to see how acquiescence—mere acquiescence—can ever go further than to bar challenge of the thing acquiesced in. It may be true that structures erected, or structural alterations made in breach of building restrictions, in the knowledge of, and without objection by, those having right to object, cannot after completion be pulled down. But the mere use of a dwelling-house in a manner contrary to the title, however long permitted in the past, cannot, as it seems to me, have any efficacy as to the future.—See Carron Co. v. Henderson's Trustees, 23 R. 1042. In the next place, even if this were otherwise, it does not seem reasonable that acquiescence in the use of a dwelling-house, say for writing chambers, or even for millinery showrooms—should be held to imply consent to the use of the premises say for a butcher's shop or even for a coachbuilder's saloon or wareroom. The difference is considerable, and is marked, if by nothing else, by the avowed necessity in the present case of extensive—although internal—structural alterations. Finally, and in the third place, it has to be considered whether, at least as between the pursuer and the co-feuars, it is not conclusive that when Mr Aitken, the pursuer's author, began to use this house as a millinery establishment, the proprietors in the Crescent intervened and obtained from Mr Aitken the letter of 16th March 1885, No. 11 of process. I confess I do not well see how in the face of that letter, and the correspondence which then passed, the pursuer can plead acquiescence in his author's contravention. It may be that as between Mr Aitken and the superiors there was no contract. It may even be—though I do not think so—that as between him and the co-feuars the letter was not so accepted as to form a concluded contract. But the fact remains that Mr Aitken's use of the premises was not acquiesced in, but objected to ; and that in order to prevent proceedings he wrote and delivered to a committee, who in fact represented both the superiors and the body of feuars, a letter by which he undertook that if he was not disturbed he would not afterwards found on the committee's inaction. I do not, as I have said, see how in these circumstances Mr Aitken's possession can affect the case ; and with regard to the possession of Messrs Dalgleish & Bell who occupied the house as writing chambers, I think it was hardly contended that their use of the premises for that purpose could support the pursuer's leading and main conclusions.

“This however brings one to consider the last question in the case, that viz., raised by the pursuer's alternative conclusion to the effect that he is at least not bound in future to use the house ‘as a dwelling-house only.’ His and others hereby disposed into a shop or shops or warerooms for the sale of goods or merchandise of any description, but that they shall be bound to use the same as a dwelling-house only."

The pursuer has brought the present action to have it found and declared that notwithstanding the terms of the foresaid charter he is not bound to use the same as a dwelling-house only, and is entitled to possess or occupy the same as a shop or wareroom, or to convert the same into a shop or ware-room, and to occupy them as such; and farther, that it should be found and declared that the foresaid restrictions have been departed from, and that the defenders have no right or title to enforce the same.

The parties called as defenders are the superiors, the Walker Trustees, and certain adjoining proprietors, of whom the Misses Hofford are proprietors of an upper flat of the same tenement of which the pursuer's house forms the street and ground flats, and the Misses Cook, the proprietors of the adjoining house in Coates Crescent.

It was not maintained to us that the restrictions in question were in themselves illegal and incapable of being enforced, but it was maintained that the superiors had lost their right to enforce them in consequence of certain proceedings which I shall afterwards have to consider.

As regards the adjoining proprietors, it was maintained that they never had any title to enforce these restrictions, and that if they had had, they also had now lost the right. As regards the matter of title, therefore, the position of the superiors and that of the other defenders is different. That of the superiors depends upon contract, and it is not disputed that they had a title to enforce the restrictions, that of the other defenders on other considerations; and it appears to me that the first question which arises for decision is, whether these other defenders had also a title to enforce these restrictions.

I have already set forth the restrictions or prohibitions in question contained in the pursuer's titles, and I need not repeat them. It is made matter of admission that the titles of the pursuer, of the Misses Cook, and of the other proprietors in Coates Crescent, of their respective properties relative plea is that he is in any view entitled to use it 'as an office,' and that plea is of course founded on the occupation of Messrs Dalgleish & Bell. Now I think this question must be considered as if it had arisen in 1885, when Messrs Dalgleish & Bell removed; and for a reason already stated, my view is that nothing had occurred in the time of Messrs Dalgleish & Bell to prejudice the rights either of the superiors or the co-tenants. There had been no structural alteration. There had been no agreement. Nothing had been done which could not be undone. There had been simply non-interference during Dalgleish & Bell's time; and when they removed matters were exactly in statu quo ante. Whether Dalgleish & Bell's occupation could have been successfully challenged, except at first, need not be considered. I incline to think that it was throughout precarious, except in so far as it might have been held that their occupation was in substance a residential occupation. But however that may be, I am unable to affirm that in respect of their occupation the pursuer is entitled to a declarator which would abridge the effect of the restriction in the title, whatever upon its just construction that effect may be.

"On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the defenders must be absolved generally from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses."

No. 187.

July 10, 1887.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

No. 187.

July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

therein, contain clauses of prohibition against the use thereof otherwise than as dwelling-houses only, and against making any deviation and alteration upon the plan and elevation adopted for Coates Crescent, and pattern balconies and iron railings in front of such subjects, in terms substantially identical.

It is farther admitted that all such titles also contain provisions relative to the pleasure-ground in Coates Crescent, and to the formation and maintenance of the sewers, inferring community of interest and obligation among the feuars with regard thereto.

At the date of the original feu-charter granted to the pursuer's predecessor houses had been built on the whole of the areas in Coates Crescent, and the charter shews that they, including the pursuer's house, had been built in strict conformity with the plan and elevation which had been adopted for the Crescent, and it is because such a common plan had been adopted that the feuar comes under the restrictions in question. Now, we learn from the case of Hislop,¹ that although the titles of the several feuars contain identical restrictions, that may not be of itself sufficient to infer mutuality of obligation, yet that if it appears that the restrictions are entered into for the benefit of the feus already existing, or to be created thereafter, the restrictions may be enforced by each co-feuar. In the case of *Hislop*¹ the Lord Chancellor stated that this mutuality of obligation can only be established by express stipulation in the respective contracts, or by reasonable implication from some reference in both contracts to a common plan or scheme of building. Now we have in this case what the Lord Chancellor desiderated in that case, viz., a reference to a common plan or scheme of building adopted by the whole feuars. Farther, it appears that the titles of all the feuars contain a clause declaring that the superiors shall have power to vary or alter any of the plans, and streets and lanes upon the ground belonging to them, and not built upon at the time of granting the respective feu-rights thereof. The inference is that the superiors had not power to vary or alter the plans, &c., on the ground built on. At the date of the pursuer's charter the whole of the areas known as Coates Gardens and Manor Place were built upon. The superiors therefore could not vary or alter, or consent to the variation or alteration of the common feuing-plan of Coates Gardens and Manor Place. This seems sufficient to shew that the common feuing-plan was not adopted in the interest of the superiors alone, but of all the feuars, thereby indicating common right and interest. It appears to me that we have in this case sufficient to imply common interest, and common obligation, on the part of all the feuars, and that therefore the defenders have a title to insist on the enforcement of the restrictions in question, unless the pursuer can shew that they have lost that right.

The grounds on which the pursuer maintains that the defenders have done so (and in this matter I do not think that there is any distinction between the case of the superiors and of the other defenders) are that the restrictions have been departed from by the consent or acquiescence of all parties having interest to enforce them, in respect that they have consented to or permitted material deviations from and alterations upon the general plan and elevation, and have consented to or permitted a use and occupation of the pursuer's premises inconsistent with the restrictions. No. 187.

¹ Dec. 17, 1879, 7 R. 384, revd. June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95.

The material alterations founded on by the pursuer are that dormer windows have been added to the roof of the tenement of which the pursuer's house forms part, and to the roofs of eleven other houses in Coates Crescent, and that complete storeys have been added to the front elevations of three other houses, one wholly of stone and the other two chiefly of timber. July 10, 1897.
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

The question would seem to be whether these deviations from the building restrictions amount to a total abandonment of them.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the consent to the abandonment of certain building restrictions, implied from acquiescence, does not imply consent to the abandonment of all building restrictions which may be imposed upon the feuars. I think that, as stated in Stewart v. Buntin,¹ the true principle is that the consent implied in acquiescence goes no farther than the things acquiesced in or things ejusdem generis, and that it is only when the acquiescence shews a virtual departure from the whole servitude that it will receive such effect. The alterations consented to, or at least permitted, in this case, are entirely consistent with the use and occupation of the premises as dwelling-houses only, which was certainly one of the principal reasons for introducing the restrictions, whereas the alterations proposed by the pursuer would convert his house into a shop or warehouse, which, as the Lord Ordinary says, is a contravention of quite a different kind, and one which is specially prohibited.

I am accordingly of opinion that the alterations already made on the buildings do not imply an abandonment of the whole building restrictions, and do not entitle the pursuer to make the alterations proposed by him.

With reference to the use and occupation of the pursuer's premises, which are alleged to have been in contravention of the restrictions in question, the facts founded on are that the pursuer's predecessors, Messrs Dalgleish & Bell, W.S., used and occupied them as writing-chambers from 1871 to 1884, and that from 1884 until the pursuer purchased them in 1896, the pursuer's predecessor, Mr Aitken, used and occupied them as a shop.

With reference to the occupation of them by Messrs Dalgleish & Bell as writing-chambers, no objection was made to it by either the superior or the feuars. On the other hand, Messrs Dalgleish & Bell made no change on the house externally or internally, except that upon the front door, which was kept shut, they placed a brass plate with "Messrs Dalgleish & Bell, W.S." engraved on it.

It appears to me that their occupation of the premises in this way must be ascribed to tolerance merely.

It does not follow that because the superior and feuars allowed Messrs Dalgleish & Bell so to occupy the premises they were bound to allow any or everybody else so to do. Still less do I think that it is to be inferred, from their non-interference with such a harmless and unnoticeable occupation as this, that they must be held to have consented to the conversion of the premises into a shop or warehouse, or their use as such.

¹ 5 R. 1108.

No. 187.

July 10, 1897
Johnston v.
The Walker
Trustees.

With reference to the occupation of the premises by Mr Aitken as a shop, the alterations made by him as affecting the appearance of the premises are set forth in the joint minute of admissions. He certainly made it perfectly plain that he was using them as a shop for the sale of millinery, but he made no change on the external or internal structure of the building.

Several of the proprietors of Coates Crescent, among whom were the defenders the Misses Cook, with the consent and approval of the superiors, objected at once to this use of the premises.

A correspondence thereupon ensued between the parties, which it is not necessary to consider in detail. It resulted in a letter, of date 16th March 1885, addressed by Mr Aitken to a committee representing proprietors of houses in Coates Crescent, which concluded in these terms, and which was communicated to the superiors,—“It will be quite open to any of the proprietors to adopt whatever proceedings they may be advised to take to have their legal rights determined without my pleading that their being at present passive be construed into consent or approval,” and it is admitted that in respect of this correspondence no legal proceedings were then taken.

It is perfectly clear that so far from Mr Aitken's use and occupation of the premises as a shop being acquiesced in by the defenders, such use of the premises was objected to and protested against all along. I do not see how implied consent can be inferred in the face of express objection.

The case would have been different if the defenders had stood by and allowed Mr Aitken to incur considerable expense in the conversion of his premises into a shop. In that case I think it is clear that they would have been barred from objecting to his occupying it as a shop, and if the pursuer had purchased the premises as converted, I think he would have been entitled to use them as such. But we have no such case here. Mr Aitken incurred no such expense with the knowledge of the defenders, and the pursuer was informed before he purchased that any use of the premises for trade purposes would be objected to.

I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Adam, and have little to add. It does not admit of doubt that the superior is entitled to enforce building conditions which he or his authors caused to be inserted in the feu-rights, unless he has debarred himself from enforcing these conditions by acquiescing in alterations of the character described in the summons, or unless he has expressly authorised the particular thing. If the parties were willing to limit the discussion to this question, I should have no difficulty in affirming that it was impossible for the pursuer to obtain decree of declarator in the face of the superior's objections. I shall say nothing on the question of acquiescence or implied abandonment of the building conditions, because I agree with all that Lord Adam has said. The principle to be applied in such questions is, that where alterations or variations of the conditions of the feu-right have been permitted, the presumption is not for abandonment, but only for relaxation of the conditions of feu, according to the nature of the variations which the feuars have presumably consented to.

But then the co-feuars, who are defenders, are not satisfied that their rights would be sufficiently protected by a decree of absolvitor in favour of the superior for all interested. They desire also to have this declarator negatived at their instance, standing on their own rights under their title-deeds. Now, the condition of the right of a co-feuar to enforce a building condition is, according to the highest authority, that he has either obtained from the superior an express authority to enforce the conditions contained in the feu-rights of his neighbours, or that there is such a reference to a common system of conditions in the titles of each of the feuars as makes it clear that these conditions were inserted for their common benefit, and not merely for the protection of the superior's rights. The clearest case of such a right accruing to feuars by implication is the case where the superior in each feu-right, or in the case of any particular feu-right, agrees that he shall insert like conditions in all feus hereafter to be granted, because his doing so amounts to a plain declaration that every vassal is to have a right to enforce the common plan or system of conditions. The feuar stands creditor in the obligation to insert such conditions in the feu-rights of his neighbours in order that he may enforce them. There could be no reason for putting the superior under such an obligation, unless the vassal was to enforce the conditions agreed to be inserted. But then this is not so strong a case. Still, where a feuar is taken bound to observe building conditions, described as elements of a common building plan which the superior intends to make binding on all the feuars within an area described, this, I consider, is equivalent to a grant to the feuar of a right to enforce the conditions. Obligatory language is not absolutely necessary to give an interest to the feuar, and it may fairly be deduced from the words used in these feu-contracts that what the feuar is bound to is, not the observance of a certain elevation or building plan for the security of the superior's feu-duty, but the preservation of a common building plan for the amenity of the street or place and the convenience of the feuars. According to the opinions delivered in the House of Lords in the case of Hislop,¹ the question is reduced to one of intention. Where it is made to appear as matter of intention, or agreement between the superior and the feuar, that the feuar shall have the right to enforce the conditions, this suffices for the decision of the question in the feuar's favour.

I agree with Lord Adam that, according to the intention of the parties and their authors, these building restrictions were imposed for the common benefit, and with the intention of giving a right to the individual feuar to insist on the fulfilment by others of the system of conditions.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

JAMIESON & DONALDSON, S.S.C.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents. •

No. 188. JOHN ROBERTSON & COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Respondents).—

C. J. Guthrie—Craigie.

ALEXANDER P. BIRD & COMPANY, Defendants (Appellants).—

Jameson—Cook.

July 10, 1897.
Robertson &
Co. v. Bird &
Co.

Process—Admission qualified by counter claim—Irrelevancy of counter claim.—Where a defender judicially admitted the pursuer's claim to a sum of money subject to an alleged counter claim, but failed to state any relevant ground for the alleged counter claim, held that the pursuer was entitled to found on the admission as unqualified.

X
1st Division.
Sheriff of Glasgow.

JOHN ROBERTSON & COMPANY, LIMITED, were, as proprietors of John Street Mill, Bridgeton, Glasgow, entitled under the Glasgow Corporation Waterworks Amendment Act, 1866, and the Glasgow Corporation Waterworks Amendment Act, 1879, to a supply of water for trade purposes from the Glasgow Corporation at the rate of 230,000 gallons for each working day, the price to be paid therefor being at the rate of 5s. 6d. per 100,000 gallons. Under the same statutes they were also entitled to a further supply of 30,000 gallons per working day, upon the same conditions, in respect of their Newhall Factory, Bridgeton, Glasgow, adjoining John Street Mill.

The firm sold part of the John Street Mill to Alexander P. Bird & Company, with entry at 15th February 1892. The total area of John Street Mill was 23,800 square yards, while the area of the part sold was 12,840 square yards. The proportion of the water supply effeiring to the part sold was 124,084 gallons. From the date of Bird & Company's entry down to 16th February 1894 they drew this quantity from the pipes connected with the mill through a water meter belonging to the Corporation at the entrance to their works. Robertson & Company paid the Corporation for this supply as part of the 230,000.

Robertson & Company raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Bird & Company for the water supplied down to 16th February 1894 at the rate of 15s. per 100,000 gallons, the market price, on the assumption that Bird & Company had no statutory right to the water. The Sheriff dismissed this action on the ground that Bird & Company had a right to a share of the statutory water supply proportional to the ground acquired by them, but reserved to the pursuers their right to payment from the defenders at the rate of 5s. 6d.

Robertson & Company then raised the present action in the Sheriff Court against Bird & Company for payment of £203, as the amount paid by them to the Corporation for the water supplied to the defenders at the 5s. 6d. rate, with interest.

The defenders, in their answers to the condescendence, stated "that the subjects sold by the pursuers had right to a proportion of the water supply in question, which right passed with the sale of the subjects to the defenders," and that under conveyance to them "the water rights attaching to the John Street Mill under the said statutes and under the titles passed as parts and pertinents with the said mill to the defenders." The defenders admitted their liability for the water supply for the two years, and for meter rent and interest, amounting in all to £190, 11s., but added to this admission,—“From this sum the defenders claim to deduct the sum of £150, with corresponding interest, being sums disbursed by defenders and damages sustained by them through the pursuers' breach of contract in refusing to share the water supply and in relinquishing part of same, as set forth in the No. 188. defenders' statement of facts, to which reference is hereby made."

The defenders stated;—(Stat. 3) "On 21st October 1892 the pursuers, in breach of contract, without the knowledge of the defenders, ^{July 10, 1897.} Robertson & Co. v. Bird & and without any warrant or authority, relinquished 130,000 gallons of Co.

the daily water supply . . . That left 130,000 gallons per day to divide among the proprietors of the John Street Mill, including Mr Strang [who was entitled to 56,040 gallons] and the defenders. The pursuers were, therefore, no longer able to give to the defenders the said quantity of 124,084 gallons per day. . . ." (Stat. 4) "The defenders were unable to carry on their work without a daily water supply, and they were compelled to apply to the Corporation for a supply. A long negotiation followed. The Corporation insisted upon a payment of £100 by the defenders as a condition of their giving to the defenders a direct supply. A minute of agreement was executed on 15th February 1894 embodying the agreement arrived at, which is produced. The defenders were also obliged to pay the legal expenses of the Corporation and of their own agents connected with the negotiation and minute of agreement. They estimate their outlay and damages in consequence of the pursuers' said breach of contract (including the said sum of £100) as £150, with corresponding interest, which they claim to set off against the pursuers' claim in this action."

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The defenders having suffered outlay and damage through the breach of contract of the pursuers, as condescended on, are entitled to set off the said outlay and damage in this action against the pursuers' claim.

On 27th March 1896, the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) decerned against the defenders ad interim for the sum of £190, 11s., with interest, as craved, on the ground that the pursuers' claim was rendered liquid to that amount by the defenders' admission, and that the defenders' counter claim being illiquid could not be set off against it.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.

The defenders appealed to the First Division, and argued;—The defenders' admission must be taken subject to the counter claim, which they relevantly averred, and they were entitled to proof of that counter claim in the present action.¹

Argued for the pursuers;—The defenders had failed to state any relevant counter claim. Their admission was therefore unqualified, and the pursuers were accordingly entitled to decree.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Sheriffs have rejected the counter claim of the defenders as being illiquid. It seems to me that a more satisfactory ground for the decision is that the claim is irrelevant.

The statements of the defenders do not seem to me to set forth any breach of contract on the part of the pursuers, or any loss caused by them. On the shewing of the defenders it would appear that they were entitled to demand from the Corporation, without any payment, the supply which they have now obtained. Their right to that supply seems to depend on the ¹ Taylor v. Forbes, Dec. 2, 1830, 9 S. 113; Scottish North-Eastern Railway Co. v. Napier, March 10, 1859, 21 D. 700, 31 Scot. Jur. 350; Johnston v. Robertson, March 1, 1861, 23 D. 646, 33 Scot. Jur. 335; Sawers v. McConnell, Jan. 22, 1874, 1 R. 392; Macbride v. Hamilton & Son, June 11, 1875, 2 R. 775; Gibson & Stewart v. Brown & Co., Jan. 13, 1876, 3 R. 328.

No. 188. fact of their proprietorship of the subjects occupied by them. From their statements it seems that the Corporation had no right to the £100, and on that footing it seems impossible to say that the defenders' payment of that sum can found any claim against the pursuers.

July 10, 1897.
Robertson &
Co. v. Bird &
Co.

We were informed that the question about £13 no longer requires decision. That being so, I think that we ought to replace the Sheriff's interim decree for £190, 11s., with a final decree for the same sum.

LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think the Sheriff's judgment is substantially right, but I am not prepared to assent without qualification to all the reasons he has given for it. The Sheriff holds that the pursuers' claim is liquid, and that the counter claim of the defenders for damages for an alleged breach of contract, not being liquid, cannot be pleaded as a set-off, but must be established in a separate action. I think it clear that the pursuers' claim is not liquid unless it can be held to be liquidated by the admissions of the defenders, and it cannot be so held if the defenders' averments in support of their counter case are relevant. To render a claim liquid it is necessary that it should be constituted, and that its exact amount should be fixed either by an obligatory writing or by the judgment of a competent Court.

The pursuers produce no such writing, and if their claim were denied it would be necessary for them to prove the facts out of which it arises, and the precise amount of the sums which they allege to be due. The question therefore is whether they are dispensed from that necessity by the defenders' admissions. Now, the defenders admit their liability for the sum of £190, 11s. for which the Sheriff has given decree against them, but the admission is made under the qualification that they are entitled to deduct from the amount decreed for a sum of £150, as the amount disbursed by them, and damages which they have sustained through the pursuers' breach of contract.

Now, it is well settled that where an admission is made under a qualification the party founding upon it must take it as it stands, and that he cannot adduce the part of his opponents' statements which is favourable to him and exclude the remainder. If therefore the allegations of fact upon which the defenders' counter claim is based were relevant, there would be no admission upon the record as it stands which could dispense the pursuer from proving his case. But, on the other hand, it would be open to him to disprove the qualification, and when that had been done, to found upon the admission as conclusive. This has been frequently decided, and I have no doubt that on the same principle the qualification may be displaced by shewing that, assuming the facts to be as stated, they afford no good answer to the claim. The question, therefore, appears to me to be, not whether the defenders can set off a claim of damages against a liquid claim, but whether the averments by which their admission is qualified are relevant to support a claim against the pursuers. I am of opinion that they are not relevant.

Their case is that they have suffered damage by the pursuers' breach of contract in relinquishing a part of the water supply which had originally belonged to the entire property of the pursuers before the defenders had acquired a portion of it. But, according to their own case as set forth in their averments, their right to a portion of this water supply did not depend upon any personal contract by which the pursuers were bound to communicate, and which it was possible for the pursuers to perform or to violate, but was a right attached to the property which the defenders had acquired, so that after their title to the property was completed it was no longer in the power of the pursuers to give or withhold the water supply. No. 188.

July 10, 1897.
Robertson &
Co. v. Bird &
Co.

Their averment in answer to the third article of the condescendence is "that the subjects sold by the pursuers to the defenders had right to a proportion of the water supply in question, which right passed with the sale of the subjects to the defenders." Again, in answer to the fifth article, they say,—"Under the agreement between the parties, and the conveyance following thereon, the waterrights attaching to the John Street Mill under the said statutes and under the titles passed as parts and pertinents with the said mill to the defenders." And they go on to say that this had been held in an action in the Sheriff Court to which the pursuers and defenders were parties. Their case, therefore is, that a certain water right had passed to them with the disposition of their property. They go on to say that the pursuers, having relinquished to the Corporation 130,000 gallons per day of the water supply appropriated to their original property, were not able to give to the defenders the 124,084 gallons which was the proportion appropriated to the subjects which they had purchased; that, accordingly, the defenders were compelled to apply to the Corporation for a direct supply, and the Corporation insisted upon a payment of £100 as a condition for giving it. This is the most material item of damages which they allege that they have suffered in consequence of the pursuers' breach of contract. But it appears to me to be plain, upon their own shewing, that the demand of the Corporation, whether it was well founded or not, did not arise out of any breach of contract on the part of the pursuers, and that the latter are in no way answerable for the demand or its consequences.

The defenders' case is that they had acquired right to this water supply as a part and pertinent of their property, and that this right was carried along with the property by the disposition in their favour. If that be so, the pursuers had done all that they could be required to do, and all that it was possible for them to do in order to communicate the right, by granting the disposition. I do not think it necessary to inquire whether the Corporation had any right or title to insist upon a payment of £100. If the defenders had a complete right to the water already, which is their own averment, it is obvious that the Corporation could have no such claim, and in that case the payment was unnecessary, and the defenders who choose to make it without any obligation to do so can have no claim to recover it from their authors.

On the other hand, if it was a quality of the right which they acquired, that before it could be made effectual they should pay a fine to the Corporation, the pursuers had given them all to which they were entitled when they conveyed the property, and along with it the right so qualified. There is no averment of any contract with the pursuers to relieve their purchasers of any claim at the instance of the Corporation. I am therefore of opinion that the defenders have stated no relevant case to found their claim of damages against the pursuers, and that their admission of liability for the

No. 190. The pursuer averred that this pasture was not included in the lease of the farm.

July 13, 1897.
Gregson v.
Alsop.

By the lease in question, which was dated in 1888, the pursuer let to James Alsop that portion of the farm of Mains of Afforsk, which belonged to the estate of Tilliefour, "all as some time occupied by James Brown." The lease further provided :—"Farther, the proprietor undertakes to put the dwelling-house, office-houses, and the ring fence into a proper state of repair, but he shall not be bound to fence the rough pasture land lying towards the Millstone Hill, which has no boundary fence, but which the tenant may fence at his own cost."

The material results of the proof were as follows :—James Brown, who preceded the defender James Alsop as tenant of the farm had not possessed the rough pasture in dispute. This pasture lay immediately beyond the fence which the pursuer was erecting, and towards Millstone Hill. There was also some rough pasture immediately within the fence. The farm had been advertised to let in October 1888, the advertisement stating that a Mr Rule (who acted as factor for the property) would point out the boundaries. The defender deponed that before offering for the farm he had applied to Mr Rule (who had since died) to point out the boundaries of the farm, and that Mr Rule had pointed out the rough pasture in dispute as belonging to the farm. The defender's evidence received some corroboration from that of other witnesses. Since his entry the defender had grazed his cattle on the disputed ground.

On 17th February 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) pronounced this interlocutor :—"Finds (1) that defender James Alsop is tenant under pursuer of the farm of Mains of Afforsk under lease, No. 12 of process ; (2) that on 30th July 1896 pursuer caused workmen to commence to erect a fence along what he considered part of the west boundary of said farm ; (3) that defender John Alsop, who is a son of the other defender, and manager for him on said farm, interfered with the workmen so erecting the fence, and threatened to throw it down, and thereafter, about 10th August, the pursuer's workmen having persisted in erecting the fence, actually did interfere with, and throw down, or cut through part of said fence or gate therein ; (4) that said fence was not upon the boundary of the farm, but was erected upon land included in the let to defender, and if it remained would have interfered with the access of defender's cattle to pasture included in the let to him : Finds in law that, in above circumstances, pursuer was not entitled to erect the said fence against the wish of defender, and is not entitled now to interdict the defenders from interfering with it : Therefore refuses the interdict craved, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns ; finds defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The facts I think are pretty clear. James Alsop became tenant of the farm at Martinmas 1888. The farm had been advertised as containing a certain number of acres, and that the boundaries would be pointed out by the then land-steward, Mr Rule. Mr Rule did point out the boundaries to defender, and I take it as proved that the boundary he pointed out included the pasture in question ; the defender says so, and he appeared to be quite a reliable witness, and he is corroborated by the witnesses Fraser and also Watt, who speaks to what Rule said to him just after defender had taken the farm, while, as against this evidence, there is upon this point really nothing. We may take it, therefore, as proved that

On appeal the Sheriff (Crawford), on 22d March, affirmed the No. 190. Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.

The pursuer appealed, and argued ;—The measure of the defender's right was the occupation of the preceding tenant, and it was proved that the preceding tenant had not occupied the pasture in dispute. The plain terms of the lease could not be controlled by extrinsic evidence of communings between the parties prior to its date.¹ There was no repugnancy between the letting and the fencing clause, as the latter clause might reasonably refer to the rough pasture which was admittedly within the boundaries of the farm.

July 18, 1897.
Gregson v.
Alsop.

Argued for the defenders ;—Extrinsic evidence was competent for the purpose of identifying the subjects let, and the evidence adduced shewed that the lease included the ground in dispute. The reference in the lease to the occupation of the preceding tenant was not taxative, and the tenant was under no obligation to inquire into the extent of his predecessor's possession.² By the advertisement of the farm he had been referred to Mr Rule as the person who would point out the Rule, whether rightly or wrongly, pointed out a boundary which includes the disputed portion as in the farm. We may further, I think, take it as clear that ever since defender entered the farm he has regularly pastured this now disputed ground. He and his son speak to it, and also other witnesses, and it is practically admitted in pursuer's letters, though of course the position taken up in the letters is that defender had been allowed to encroach over the pasture for a number of years.

"No doubt whatever was proved as to the boundaries pointed out, or subsequent possession, would be of no avail against clearly defined boundaries if stated in written lease between the parties ; the lease must, if clear and unambiguous, be conclusive as to what is let. The first question therefore that must be disposed of in the case is, whether the terms of the lease here are so unambiguous as to be conclusive. In my opinion they are not. It will be seen that the farm is said to be let 'all as some time occupied by James Brown,' who was the former tenant.

"But in a subsequent portion of the lease the following clause appears with reference to fencing :—'Further, the proprietor undertakes to put the ring fence into a proper state of repair, but he shall not be bound to fence the rough pasture land lying towards the Millstone Hill, which has no boundary fence, but which the tenant may fence at his own expense.'

"It appears, according to Brown's, or rather his son's, evidence, that he did not pasture the disputed ground. His march, he stated, was as contended for by pursuer, but it appears from Brown's lease, which is in process, that he occupied 'as lately possessed by George Milton.' Milton possessed under a lease granted to Charles Thom. Thom had desired to give up the farm, and Milton was accepted by the proprietor as instead of him, and he possessed under Thom's lease. Thom is examined as a witness, and states that he pastured this disputed ground, and considered he had the right to it under his lease.

"If there were nothing further therefore it would be a little difficult to say what Brown's rights were, or what 'as possessed by Brown' really meant. But when the subsequent clause I have quoted is taken into consideration, I do not think there can be much doubt of what really was let to defender. Various plans and sketches are produced, but to my mind no intelligible explanation of the phrase 'rough pasture lying towards the

¹ Carmichael v. Penny, June 26, 1874, 11 S. L. R. 634.

² Critchley v. Campbell, Feb. 1, 1884, 11 R. 475, per Lord President Inglis, p. 479-80 ; Duncan v. Scott, June 20, 1876, 3 R. (H. L.) 69.

No. 190. boundaries, and it was satisfactorily proved that Mr Rule pointed out the ground in dispute as part of the farm subsequently let to the defender. The farm having been taken on the faith of this representation, the landlord was barred from disputing its accuracy. Further, on the pursuer's construction of the lease there was a repugnancy between the letting and fencing clauses, for the reference in the fencing clause to the rough pasture lying towards Millstone Hill could not be reasonably explained as applying to any other ground than that in dispute. This difficulty could only be got over by holding that ground to be included in the lease.

July 13, 1897.
Gregson v.
Alsop.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Sheriffs have pointed out that the question upon which the parties have joined issue is as to the boundaries of the land let to the defender James Alsop. The lease is a probative writing, and, in my opinion, it affords a definite and conclusive criterion of this dispute.

One naturally turns first to the description of the subjects let in the clause of actual lease, just as in a disposition the dispositive clause is the primary and authoritative place for ascertaining the subject of the grant. Well, this lease purports to let a certain part of a former and larger farm

Millstone Hill, which has no boundary fence,' is given, except that it is the pasture here in question, and if so, it must have been included in the let, otherwise the tenant could have no reason for fencing it. This view is, I think, also borne out by the letter and sketch produced, which defender says he got from Rule.

"I am disposed therefore to think that the lease is at least as favourable to defender's view as to pursuer's, and looking to the evidence I have already referred to as to the march actually pointed out by the man authorised to do it, and the subsequent possession, I am prepared to hold that defender has proved his case. With reference to the question of possession, I should probably have referred before to what is unquestionably, in my view, a very strong indication of how matters stood,—I mean as to the way in which Mr Alsop junior seems to have been dealing with and working at fences which, according to pursuer's contention, were not on the farm. Some of his statements as to these fences are not admitted, but in regard to one of the fences, viz, the one going from the south-west corner of field 763 in plan out to the old dyke, there is no doubt that he both erected this fence and knocked it down, surely indicating pretty clearly the state of possession as regards the ground on which the fence was.

"It is no doubt stated by the witness Troup, and also by Coull, what the recognised boundary of this farm was, and there is no reason to doubt their evidence. I think likely the mistake arose in consequence of the idea of there being a ring fence round the arable part of the farm, and the disputed part being outside of the ring fence.

"It is also the fact that an acreage is given in the advertisement which corresponds with the acreage of the farm as the boundaries are stated by the landlord. I am prepared to hold, however, that even if this advertisement can be relevantly adduced as evidence when followed by a written lease, which is at least doubtful, the acreage in it is not taxative of the actual farm let to defenders (Rankine, Landownership, pp. 96, 97). In the present case the words of the lease, the boundaries which have been proved to have been pointed out, and the state of possession, constitute a more reliable guide than the acreage advertised.

"I therefore hold that the land upon which this fence was being put up was included in the farm as let to defender, and that pursuer is not entitled to interdict defender from interfering with it."

called Mains of Afforsk, and then states certain boundaries of the subjects No. 190. let, none of which touch the part of the farm which we are concerned with, or afford any help in the solution of the present question. But July 13, 1897. Gregson v. Alsop. then the lease adds the words,—“all as some time occupied by James Brown.”

Now, in my opinion, this description prescribes a standard and criterion of the boundaries of the farm, which can only be got over by some clear and unequivocal addition or subtraction contained within the lease itself, or by some independent or subsequent grant. On the face of the clause which I have quoted, the tenant has right to what James Brown occupied, and to no more. Anything that passed before the lease was executed is superseded by this contractually accepted standard of boundaries—the possession by James Brown. Accordingly, I hold that, even supposing that the ground officer had said, in shewing the tenant over the farm, that the boundary was here, or was there, this does not avail, as the parties afterwards set down in writing that the farm is let (not as pointed out by the ground officer but) as occupied by James Brown. Of course if it had been proved that the person authorised to shew the farm had said that James Brown occupied up to a certain point, another question might arise, viz., whether the landlord was not barred from questioning the truth of this statement. But nothing of that kind occurs in this case. And I am unable to admit into consideration the various circumstances to which both Sheriffs give weight as entering into competition with the criterion set up by the lease, viz., what was in fact occupied by James Brown.

Now, the peculiarity of the case is, that on this question of fact there is no dispute whatever. James Brown did not occupy the ground now claimed by the tenant.

The only remaining question would therefore seem to be, does any other clause in the lease extend the area of possession, and the defenders point to the fencing clause. The proprietor undertakes to put “the ring fence into a proper state of repair, but he shall not be bound to fence the rough pasture land lying towards the Millstone Hill, which has no boundary fence, but which the tenant may fence at his own cost.” The defenders' argument is that the rough pasture land here referred to is the ground in dispute, and that the clause implies that it is part of the farm.

Now, a fencing clause is necessarily subordinate to the letting clause, in this sense, that it naturally is confined to the fencing of the subjects already described as let. It would, to say the least, be a very unusual and unexpected thing in a formal lease for the parties to use the fencing clause for the purpose of incidentally, and by implication, granting a lease of something outside the boundaries already laid down in the part of the lease which professes to do this. It is only if the facts compelled such a construction that it could be adopted. Now, I do not think that any such necessity arises. We have to see whether there is not within the limits of the farm as possessed by James Brown something which reasonably meets the description of rough pasture land lying towards the Millstone Hill which has no boundary fence; and I think that the field 763 is in this position. It lies towards Millstone Hill, and on that side it was unfenced. Historically, it was once under tillage, but it has not been so for years, and

No. 190. at the date of the lease there was nothing but its history to distinguish it from rough pasture land.
 July 13, 1897. Accordingly, I do not find any repugnancy between the fencing clause Gregson v. and the letting clause. What the effect of such a repugnancy might have Alsop. been is therefore a question which does not arise.

The defenders have no case of any extension of the farm by agreement subsequent to the lease. Mr John Alsop's own evidence as to what passed when Mr Rule visited the ground and the absence of any averment on record shew that this theory cannot be maintained.

I am for recalling the interlocutors appealed against, and granting the interdict craved.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I also concur. In your Lordship's opinion there is a reservation of a question which may hereafter arise for our consideration, when there is a discrepancy between the terms of the description given in the lease and the lands pointed out by the agent of the landlord as falling within that description. In such a case the question might arise whether the landlord was not barred by the representations of his authorised agent. Another point might perhaps arise in the case of a farm defined by boundaries and also by reference to past possession. If there was a discrepancy between the boundaries and the possession as proved, the question might arise whether effect was to be given to the description by boundaries or by possession. In all such cases the question of the identity of the subjects is a question of fact, and I do not think that any absolute rule can be laid down for their decision.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that the only title of possession proponed by the defenders is the probative lease No. 12 of process; (2) that the ground now in dispute was not occupied by James Brown mentioned in the lease; (3) that within the farm as occupied by James Brown the field No. 763 was, at the date of the lease, rough pasture land lying towards the Millstone Hill, and had no boundary fence; (4) that the fence which has been interfered with does not encroach on the farm as occupied by James Brown: Find in law that the defenders have no right to interfere with or injure the said fence: Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff, dated 17th February and 22d March 1897 respectively: Interdict the defenders in terms of the prayer of the petition," &c.

SOMERVILLE & WATSON, S.S.C.—ANDREW URQUHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 191. JOHN FRANCIS SMYTH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Watt—Wilton.
 July 13, 1897.* LACHLAN MACKINNON, Defender (Reclaimier).—Balfour—W. Brown.
 Smyth v. Reparation—Slander—"Misappropriation of money"—Innuendo—Privi-
 Mackinnon. lege—Relevancy.—In an action of damages for slander, brought by an auctioneer against a solicitor. the pursuer averred that, on 16th May 1896, the defender had employed him to sell some furniture belonging to a trust-estate; that the pursuer sold the furniture, and rendered to the defender a statement of the prices realised for which he was liable to account to the defender; that on 15th August the defender wrote to the pursuer a letter in which the defender, after acknowledging receipt of a letter from the pursuer, intimated that he (the defender) was to "convene the trustees early next week, and shall put before them your misappropriation of their money, and take their instructions. The consequences, I have little doubt, will be of a very serious character to you"; and that in the said letter the defender falsely, calumniously, and maliciously intended to represent, and did represent, that the pursuer had been guilty of dishonest misappropriation of money.

No. 191.

July 13, 1897.
Smyth v.
Mackinnon.

The defender denied the innuendo averred, and referred to a correspondence between himself and the pursuer, of which the letter founded on formed a part. From this correspondence (the authenticity of which the pursuer admitted on record) it appeared that the defender had, for several weeks prior to the date of the letter founded on, been pressing the pursuer to pay the sums realised at the sale of the furniture, and that the pursuer intimated his present inability to do this in consequence of having made advances with the money in the erroneous belief that he would be in funds by the time the money became payable to the defender.

The pursuer further averred that after he had paid the money realised by the furniture to the defender, the defender had falsely, maliciously, and calumniously stated to the agent of a bank that the pursuer had misappropriated trust money, meaning thereby that the pursuer had dishonestly appropriated to his own uses moneys belonging to the trustees.

The defender averred in answer that the agent of the bank was his father and partner in business, and pleaded privilege. At the hearing in the Inner-House counsel for the pursuer, in answer to a question from the Bench, stated that he understood that this averment was accurate.

Held (1) that as the letter of 15th August bore to be part of a correspondence it was competent, even on a question of relevancy, to look at the whole correspondence of which it formed a part; that so regarding the letter it was not in itself slanderous, and did not support the innuendo put upon it by the pursuer; and therefore (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that an issue founded on the letter fell to be disallowed; but (2), aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney, diss. Lord Young, that the pursuer's averments of verbal slander uttered to the bank agent were to be taken as they stood on record; that they relevantly set forth a case of verbal slander, but did not disclose a case of privilege, and therefore that an ordinary issue of damages for slander fell to be allowed, the question of privilege being left to be determined by the Judge at the trial.

IN February 1897 John Francis Smyth, auctioneer, Crown Court, 2nd DIVISION. Aberdeen, raised an action against Lachlan Mackinnon, youngest, Lord Kin-advocate, 23 Market Street, Aberdeen, concluding for decree for cairney. £1000 as damages for slander.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "On or about 16th May 1896 the defender, on the instructions of the trustees of the late Mr Thompson, of Pitmedden, employed the pursuer to remove from Pitmedden House the furniture therein to Aberdeen for private sale. . . ." (Cond. 3) "The pursuer duly removed the said furniture, and disposed of the same on account of the said clients of the defender, and rendered a statement of the prices of the various items thereof, for which he was liable and willing to account to the defender as their agent." (Cond. 4) "On or about 15th August 1896 the defender wrote and sent, or caused to be written and sent, to the pursuer a letter in the following terms:—

' 23 Market Street, Aberdeen, 15th August 1896.

' Sir,—I have received yours of 14th. I know nothing about your

No. 191. brother, and must decline your proposal. If he requires three months to get a remittance from Canada, his obligation is presumably no better than your own. I am to convene the trustees early next week, and shall put before them your misappropriation of their money, and take their instructions. The consequences, I have little doubt, will be of a very serious character to you.—Yours obediently,

July 18, 1897.
Smyth v.
Mackinnon.

'L. MACKINNON, Yo^{rs}.

'Mr John F. Smyth, Auctioneer,
'Crown Court.'

(Cond. 5) "In the said letter the defender falsely, calumniously, and maliciously, and without probable or any cause, intended to represent, and did represent, that the pursuer had been guilty of the dishonest and fraudulent misappropriation of money belonging to his said clients, and of such a kind as to subject the pursuer in a criminal prosecution therefor. The defender was well aware when he wrote the said letter that the pursuer was only liable to account to his said clients for any balance due by him upon his intromissions with the said furniture, and that he was able, upon obtaining the short delay for which he asked the defender, to meet his said liability, but he unwarrantably, maliciously, and illegally used the threat of criminal proceedings contained in the said letter, to obtain payment of such balance. The explanations in answer, subject to the terms of the letters mentioned, are denied. . . ."

The defender in answer to cond. 5 denied the pursuer's averments, and referred to the correspondence quoted below.*

* Letter, pursuer to defender, dated 17th July 1896.—"When I sent in the statement of sale of the remainder of Pitmedden goods I said I would pay the cash to-day. Much to my annoyance the money on which I calculated for this purpose will not reach me, I find, before the beginning of August, and I have to ask you kindly to wait till then, as I cannot well press for payment without damage to my business."

Letter, defender to pursuer, dated 21st July 1896.—"I have received your letter of 17th inst., but am not disposed to wait longer for the money due to Mr Thompson's trustees. There is no reason why you should not at least make a substantial payment on account, and I await the same in course."

Letter, pursuer to defender, dated 24th July 1896.—"I did not at once reply to yours of 21st, because I thought I might get in some money, and be able to comply with your request to make a substantial payment to a/c., but I find it impossible meantime. I depended for the whole am^t at the date I fixed (17th inst.) on a gentleman who has been travelling, and has been detained. I am quite certain to have it next month, and early in the month, and shall at once square up. I was misled into making some advances on the assumption that I would have the money referred to above on the 16th inst., and thought it unnecessary to make any other provision, and I cannot recover my advances yet. I am exceedingly sorry for this irregularity, but have to ask you kindly to extend your indulgence as far as you can, and shall make payment as early as possible next month."

Letter, defender to pursuer, dated 31st July 1896.—"On returning here after a few days' absence, I find your letter of 24th inst., which is very far from satisfactory. You have no excuse for withholding at least a substantial payment, because you have received the money, and my clients have nothing to do with your private difficulties. If you do not settle the balance due in course of next week, I shall advise the trustees to take immediate proceedings against you, and you will get no further notice."

Letter, pursuer to defender, dated 14th August 1896.—"I regret I have

The pursuer further averred,—(Cond. 6) “Upon 18th August 1896 No. 191. the pursuer paid the defender £73, 5s. 8d., in payment of the said balance due by him to his said clients, and received his discharge therefor. . . .” (Cond. 7) “Notwithstanding that July 13, 1897. Smyth v. Mackinnon. the pursuer had duly accounted for the said balance, the defender, on or about 5th September 1896, and in or near his office at 23 Market Street, Aberdeen, falsely, calumniously, and maliciously, and without probable or any cause, stated to Lachlan Mackinnon junior, advocate, Aberdeen, agent of the branch of the British Linen Company at Market Street, Aberdeen, of and concerning the pursuer, that the pursuer had shortly before misappropriated moneys belonging to the trustees of the late Mr Thompson of Pitmedden, or used words of the like import, meaning, and effect, meaning thereby that the pursuer had dishonestly appropriated to his own uses moneys belonging to the said trustees. The said Lachlan Mackinnon junior thereupon communicated the said false statement to John Montgomerie, the subagent of the said bank at Aberdeen.”

The defender made the following answer to cond. 7:—(Ans. 7) “Denied. Explained that the said Lachlan Mackinnon junior is the father and partner in business of the defender, and as such partner had access to and knowledge of the correspondence passing between the pursuer and defender in the months of July and August 1896. At that time the said Lachlan Mackinnon junior was agent of the Market Street branch of the British Linen Bank in Aberdeen.”

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer’s averments are irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The letter of 15th August 1896 not being libellous or calumnious in its terms, and containing no false, malicious, or calumnious representations regarding the pursuer, the defender ought to be assolizied. (4) Privilege.

On 21st May 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) approved of the following issues:—*

“1. Whether the defender wrote and sent, or caused to be written not yet got possession of the cash, out of which I expected, ere now, to have settled your a/c. Being very anxious to keep faith with you, I applied to my brother, who is home on a visit from Canada, where he carries on a large business in stores and lumber. I enclose his letter in reply, and trust you will accept his offered bill in security, though I shall without doubt discharge the debt myself within a very short time, though I am unwilling to fix a definite date, lest I should again be disappointed and have to ask further time. I enclose my brother’s card, and have only to say that he is very well able to meet anything he puts his name to; and if you will let me know your mind in course of Saturday, I shall at once send on a bill for his acceptance so that it may be returned on Tuesday morning.”

The letter from the pursuer’s brother was to the effect that the writer could not lend the pursuer £75 in cash, but offered his acceptance for that amount at three months.

Then followed the letter from the defender of 15th August 1896 founded on by the pursuer on record.

* “OPINION.—The first question is, whether the charge of misappropriation warrants the innuendo of dishonest misappropriation, or dishonest appropriation, and I think that it does. That is to say, that it may be put as a question to the jury whether the charge was an accusation of dishonesty or not. The pursuer desired that the issue should be whether the defender had charged him with dishonest appropriation; and I think the issue may

No. 191. and sent, to the pursuer a letter in the terms contained in the schedule hereto annexed [i.e. the letter of 15th August 1896], and whether the said letter is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer had dishonestly appropriated moneys belonging to the clients of the defender, being the trustees of the late Mr Thompson of Pitmedden, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

July 13, 1897.
Smyth v.
Mackinnon.

"2. Whether on or about 5th September 1896, and in or near his office at 23 Market Street, Aberdeen, the defender falsely and calumniously stated to Lachlan Mackinnon, advocate, Aberdeen, of and concerning the pursuer, that the pursuer had shortly before misappropriated moneys belonging to the said trustees, or used words of the like import, meaning, and effect, meaning thereby that the pursuer had dishonestly misappropriated said moneys, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The first issue ought to be disallowed. The letter of 15th August 1896, founded on by the pursuer, was part of a business correspondence between the pursuer himself and the defender, in the course of which the pursuer described his conduct as an "irregularity." The defender called it "misappropriation" of money, which was a practically equivalent expression. The pursuer said that by "misappropriation" the defender meant dishonest misappropriation. That was a forced innuendo, looking to the whole correspondence. If the pursuer had made a very specific averment of extrinsic facts and circumstances to shew that the defender meant dishonest misappropriation, the issue might possibly have been supported, but there was no such averment. In any view, the defender was clearly privileged, and there must therefore be specific averments shewing malice, which here there were not. (2) The second issue ought also to be disallowed. If the letter of 15th August did not per se support the innuendo, it would not become action-be allowed in that respect as he suggests. I should have preferred the words dishonest misappropriation, as more nearly approaching the words actually used, and I do not think such words would be objectionable as redundant, because there may no doubt be misappropriation which is not dishonest, as well as appropriation which is not dishonest. But there is not much to choose between the two phrases, and I am prepared to adjust the issue in the words which the pursuer prefers.

"The defender maintained that the first issue should be disallowed, because the occasion averred was privileged, and that the averments of malice on record were irrelevant for want of specification. I think it is a narrow question whether privilege is disclosed on the pursuer's record. Several recent decisions were referred to, but I think that the case of Wilson v. Purvis, 1st November 1890, 18 R. 72, comes nearest to the present case, and that I ought to follow it, and adjust the issue without inserting malice. It was not contended that malice should be put in the second and third issues.* It was indeed maintained that the pursuer could not get a verdict without proof of malice; but it was admitted that it could not be determined until the facts were proved, whether the occasion were privileged or not. I think that, with reference to all the issues, the question whether it is necessary to prove malice must be left for decision at the trial. The further question will then also arise, whether the averments are such as to admit of proof of malice, or whether the averment of malice is irrelevant. That cannot be determined at present.

* The pursuer abandoned the third issue.

able by being shewn to Lachlan Mackinnon junior, who was the defender's father, and partner in business, and there was nothing in the pursuer's averments to shew that the defender did anything more than tell his partner what he himself knew about the pursuer as appearing from the correspondence. [LORD YOUNG.—Do you, Mr Watt, admit that Lachlan Mackinnon junior is the father and partner in business of the defender? Watt.—I understand that that is the case, but the pursuer does not aver it.] In any case the second issue ought also to be disallowed on the ground that the defender was clearly privileged in communicating what he knew to his partner regarding a business matter of the firm, and malice was not relevantly averred.

No. 191.
July 13, 1897.
Smyth v.
Mackinnon.

Argued for the pursuer;—"Misappropriation of money" prima facie meant dishonest misappropriation; at all events it was susceptible of that meaning; it was very different from "irregularity."¹ If then the words fairly bore the meaning put on them by the pursuer, the truth of the innuendo was for the jury,² and the question of privilege was also for the jury, as no case of privilege appeared ex facie of pursuer's averments. Malice therefore ought not to be put in issue. The case for the second issue was a fortiori of the first. It might be that the defender did no more than communicate the correspondence to Lachlan Mackinnon junior, and it might also be that Lachlan Mackinnon junior was the defender's father and partner; but the pursuer's averments must be taken as they stood; and taking these averments the pursuer's case was this,—That the defender, after the money had been paid, told a bank-agent that the pursuer had misappropriated money. That was plainly actionable, and was not privileged.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On consideration I have come to the conclusion that the first issue ought not to be allowed. The whole basis of that issue is a letter in answer to a letter of pursuer's own, and the basis for an innuendo there does not seem to me to be sound. Therefore I do not think the first issue should be allowed.

As regards the second issue, it is in a different position, because it relates to a statement made verbally to another person, and that issue, I think, should be allowed. That issue, therefore, will go to trial if your Lordships are of the same opinion.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion with respect to the first issue, but I differ from your Lordship, and also from the Lord Ordinary, with respect to the second.

With regard to the first issue, I think it is only necessary to say—but I think it is necessary and important to say—with reference to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary and to the argument before us, that the slander or alleged slander founded on being in a letter which, on the face of it, bears to be part of a correspondence, we must look at the correspondence of which it is part. If that correspondence had not been produced and ¹ H. M. Advocate v. Lee, Oct. 20, 1884, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 2, 5 Coup. 492.

² Sexton v. Ritchie, March 18, 1890, 17 R. 680, aff. March 19, 1891, 18 R. (H. L.) 20; Ramsay v. MacLay & Co., Nov. 18, 1890, 18 R. 130.

No. 191. admitted, I think we would have required that it should be produced, and that we would have required to see whether it was genuine or not.

July 13, 1897.
Smyth v.
Mackinnon.

This letter containing the alleged slander, which is the subject of the first issue, is dated 15th August 1896, and is a letter addressed by the defender as a man of business acting for clients to the pursuer, with whom he had been in correspondence about the clients' business as to which he had employed the pursuer—(His Lordship read the letter). Now, in that letter of 14th August, which is referred to, the pursuer wrote to the defender asking for delay to allow him to get money to pay what he was bound to pay, and offering his brother's security; and the letter containing the alleged slander is in answer to that. But that letter is only a part of the correspondence in which the pursuer was pressed on the one hand to remit the money belonging to the defender's clients which he had in his hands, and in which, on the other hand, he was pleading for delay. And the important letter is dated 24th July, written by pursuer—(His Lordship read the letter).

Now, it appears from the statement on record, and from the whole of this correspondence, that the history of the matter is that the defender as a man of business had employed the pursuer as an auctioneer to sell the property of his clients, that the pursuer sold it, and irregularly made advances out of the money to somebody who could not return them. He calls that an irregularity. I think no one would doubt that it was an irregularity that an auctioneer who has sold the property of an employer and got the cash for it should advance it to anybody—a friend or anybody else—and put it out of his power to pay it up to his employer. It is for that money, to which the whole of this correspondence relates, that he is being pressed, and in the letter of 15th August, which is proposed to be the subject of the first issue, the defender avers nothing except what the pursuer had stated that he had done, and irregularly done. He calls that irregularity, of which the pursuer himself informed him, a misappropriation of money, which he finds it to be his duty to bring before his clients unless the money is paid. Now, there is here no imputation of any fact or of any conduct. I put the question more than once in the course of the argument, Was the irregularity that the pursuer himself admits not misappropriation, and if it was, was it libellous to call it by that name? The answer was,—“But it would be actionable if he thought it was dishonest, and we wish to put the defender into the box and ask him,—‘Was it dishonest misappropriation which you meant when you used that word in the letter?’” Well, I should have thought that a very singular question for anybody to put, as singular as for us to give the opportunity by allowing an issue on such a matter. For it would come to this,—“Your letter is actionable if you thought that the pursuer to whom you addressed it had acted improperly in committing an irregularity which he himself told you he had done.” I think that is extravagant on the statement of it. Slander is imputing some transgression to a man—saying or suggesting that he did something which he never did. There is nothing imputed to the pursuer here which he does not say he did, and as to having an opinion on the matter as to whether it was a more or less dishonest misappropriation—for misappropriation it certainly was—I am very clearly and distinctly of opinion that that is not a subject for an action for libel at all. With No. 191. regard to the first issue, I therefore agree with your Lordship, but I have thought it necessary to make these observations in consequence of the judgment of the Lord Ordinary and the argument that was maintained before us for the pursuer.

Now, with regard to the second issue, I think I must take the fact to be this. It is not stated by the pursuer, but it is stated by the defender—and the statement is admitted at the bar to be the truth, so that if we proceed upon any other view we would be proceeding on a view that was not true—that Lachlan Mackinnon junior is the father and partner in business of the defender. As such partner he would have access to and knowledge of the correspondence passing between the pursuer and defender in July and August 1896. Well, then, the communication alleged in condescendence 7 is a communication between two parties in business, and in relation to the business. Both parties were equally entitled to know of this correspondence, and it was certainly the right of either party to bring it under the notice of the other. Now, what is proposed here—and the case, so far as I know, is unique in that respect—is to make the subject of an issue a communication made by one partner in the business to another—a son to his father, who is his partner in the business—on a matter relating to that business. The averment is this—(His Lordship read cond. 7). It could not fail to occur to anybody, reading the record and correspondence, that the communication here referred to was in respect to the irregularity admitted by the pursuer in the letter which I have already mentioned. The pursuer's counsel admitted that he had no reason to think that there was anything else. Then it comes to this, that the junior partner of the business calls the attention of his father, the senior partner, to this irregularity, which the pursuer stated in his letter he had committed, and we are asked to decide that a communication of that sort may be the subject of an action of damages for slander. It was pressed on us—and I thoroughly understand and appreciate the argument—that the father was not only a partner of that business but also agent for the British Linen Company. But I cannot see that that makes any difference. I cannot assent to the idea that one partner is to be restrained by the law of defamation and slander from making a communication to another partner—a son to his father—because the father happens to be also agent for a bank. I must therefore deal with this as a communication made by one partner to another in regard to the business of the firm in transacting the business of a client. Now, I cannot think that that is a subject for an action of defamation at all. And therefore, with respect to the second issue, as well as with respect to the first, I am very clearly of opinion that it ought to be disallowed.

I have said enough to shew, I think, that there is here no room for the idea of innuendo—there is no innuendo here at all. To innuendo is to suggest by some indirect words—by nodding, grimacing, making faces, or otherwise (nodding is the real meaning of the word)—that a man did suggest something which you are going to put into distinct words. There is no suggestion here that he did anything more than merely make reference to the pursuer's letter in which the pursuer states what he did. And therefore I think there is no room for innuendo.

No. 191.

July 13, 1897.
Smyth v.
Mackinnon.

The only other remark I have to make is on what is comparatively of little importance—on the form of the issue, as to which we had some discussion—the insertion of “malice.” Dealing with the case as prima facie one of privilege, I should like to make this general observation—that I think our practice ought to be, and I think generally has been, where the case is one of privilege, upon the statement of the pursuer, to insert “malice.” In cases where there may be privilege or not, according to circumstances which are in dispute, then it is left to be determined at the trial—to the direction of the Judge; but where the question of privilege does not depend on circumstances—matters of fact in dispute between the parties—then I think, in the interests of the parties themselves and for the guidance of the Judge at the trial, it ought to be dealt with as a case of privilege and malice put into the issue. I repeat it, for I think it is a safe general rule for adoption—and I have been under the impression that it was the generally adopted rule—that unless the question of privilege or malice depends on matter of disputed fact it ought to be determined in adjusting the issues. If it depends on matter of disputed fact then it may—indeed must—be left for consideration at the trial. Now, I do not think here, with respect to this communication by one partner to another, that it depends upon disputed fact at all. I think I put the question more than once, What is the fact in dispute on which it depends whether this will be privileged or not? None occurs to me. The statement is that the misappropriation was of moneys belonging to the trustees of the late Mr Thompson of Pitmedden. Now, it is the pursuer’s case that the trustees of the late Mr Thompson of Pitmedden were clients of the defender. It is also admitted by the pursuer’s counsel that the defender and his father, Lachlan Mackinnon junior, were in partnership. I cannot avoid repeating that. If it turns out that they were partners,—that is to say, if it turns out that the fact on which parties are agreed (although the pleading is not correct) is true,—then it was a statement by one partner to another in regard to the business of a client of the partnership. Now, is that not prima facie a case of privilege? I cannot make it an actionable slander at all; but assuming that it is, then the case is one of privilege, in which malice is not to be presumed from the mere statement, but must be proved, and it would be right enough to put it into the issue.

LORD TRAYNER.—I would not have been sorry if I could have come to the same conclusion as Lord Young, because I cannot help thinking and saying that I regard this as a very ill-advised action on the part of the pursuer, but as the pursuer insists in his right to go to trial on the issues which he has proposed, these must of course be considered.

I agree with both your Lordships that the first issue cannot be allowed, for the reasons which Lord Young has assigned are unanswerable, and I concur with his Lordship’s views.

But I take a very different view of the second issue from my learned brother who last spoke. An issue when granted and put before a jury is controlled by the record, and in making or granting an issue I think the Court is controlled by the record. Now, in cond. 7 there is no averment made by the pursuer that the defender and Lachlan Mackinnon junior are partners in business. It was no doubt stated at the bar, but it was stated in answer to questions put from the bench, and which the bar could not with any propriety decline to answer. But it is not part of the pursuer's case. The pursuer's case is that the defender stated to Lachlan Mackinnon junior, advocate, Aberdeen, and agent for the British Linen Company there, that he, the pursuer, had been guilty of misappropriation of money. Now, I think the word "misappropriation" may fairly enough, without any straining of its natural meaning, be read as the pursuer proposes to read it, namely, as dishonest misappropriation, and therefore, according to the practice of the Court, I am not prepared to refuse the pursuer an issue under which he proposes to prove that the misappropriation which the defender said he had been guilty of was dishonestly appropriating to his own use moneys belonging to other persons.

No. 191.

July 13, 1897.

Smyth v.
Mackinnon.

But just assume for a moment that the defender and Lachlan Mackinnon junior are partners, it does not in the least appear that one partner may speak to another in libellous terms of a third party without being responsible for it. The mere fact that they are partners does not excuse or warrant a slanderous statement. It may very well introduce the element of whether or not a statement which is in itself slanderous is privileged, but that is a totally different matter. But if one partner states to another that a third party, whom he names, has been guilty of dishonestly appropriating to his own uses moneys belonging to another person, I take that to be a slander just as much as if the parties had not been partners at all.

Now, with regard to the question of malice, I think that if it had been stated on record that the one partner laid before the other the correspondence that had passed between him (the speaker) and a third person charged with misappropriation, as part of the communications by one partner to another in relation to the company's business, it would have been privileged. But again, I say that is not the pursuer's record, and we cannot force the pursuer, I should think, by questions from the bench or otherwise, to alter his record, or make his record other than he proposes to make it himself. Now, taking that view of the statement in cond. 7, I am of opinion that the pursuer is clearly entitled to this second issue. If it had appeared, as I have already said, that the parties were partners, and that the only thing the defender had done was to lay before his partner the correspondence that had taken place in the course of the firm's business with the pursuer, I should have held that that was a case for putting "malice" into the issue. But cond. 7 bears no reference to the correspondence, but states that notwithstanding that the pursuer had duly accounted for the balance—and that is after the correspondence had ceased—the defender made this false and slanderous statement to Lachlan Mackinnon junior, which he (the pursuer) proposes to make the subject of this issue. In these circumstances I think the pursuer is entitled to the second issue, and with respect to the statements on record I think it is not prima facie a case of privilege, although privilege may appear at the trial. The defender's interest will be amply protected by the Judge who tries the case, for if privilege does appear he will direct the jury that malice must be proved.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I think the first issue should be disallowed. The

No. 191.

July 13, 1897.
Smyth v.
Mackinnon.

question turns entirely upon the correspondence, and on the correspondence I do not think that there is room, or that there are materials, for the innuendo which the pursuer seeks to put upon the terms of the defender's letter of 15th August 1896. I do not see how the defender could have used a milder or more appropriate term to describe the irregular application of the money which the pursuer himself deplors in the most deprecatory language in his letter of 24th July 1896. The word "misappropriation" or the word "misuse" would, according to the pursuer's argument, have been equally open to this innuendo.

The second issue does not stand in exactly the same position. The slander alleged in cond. 7 is a verbal slander said to have been uttered on 5th September 1896 after the money had been replaced. If, as there is no reason to doubt, the communication, if made, was made to the defender's father and partner, there is a strong probability that it will be shewn to have been not only privileged but unavoidable. At the same time we have not, as in the case of the first issue, the whole materials for forming an opinion as to the meaning intended to be conveyed by the words used, and the circumstances in which they were uttered; and therefore with some reluctance I agree that this issue should be granted.

I entirely agree with the observations made by Lord Trayner as to the character of the case. I do not think we can avoid granting the second issue, but I am certainly most reluctant to do so.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor appealed against, disallowed the first issue proposed for the pursuer, approved of the second issue proposed for the pursuer to be the issue for the trial of the cause, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to be tried before him on a day to be afterwards fixed.

ALEXANDER BOWIE, Solicitor—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 192.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF THE PARISH OF CRIEFF, Petitioners.—Clyde.
WILLIAM STOWELL HALDANE, Minuter.—Grainger Stewart.

July 14, 1897.
School Board
of Crieff.

Charitable Bequest—Petition for alteration of scheme framed by Endowments Commissioners—Competency of considering amendment of scheme not within scope of petition.—By clause 21 of a scheme settled by the Educational Endowments Commissioners for the administration of the "Innerpeffray Mortification," it was provided that the governors of the mortification might grant the use of the school at Innerpeffray to the School Board of Muthill, and might pay that School Board the sum of £15 annually, on condition that they maintained a school therein. The district in which the school was situated having been in 1893 transferred by the Boundary Commissioners to the parish of Crieff, the School Board of Crieff presented a petition, craving the Court to alter the scheme for the administration of the mortification by substituting their name in clause 21 for that of the School Board of Muthill, and to reduce the payment from £15 to £10, the latter sum having been found sufficient to meet the charges of the school. In the course of the proceedings under this petition one of the governors of the mortification lodged a minute, in which he raised the question whether any part of the funds of the mortification should be paid to the School Board.

Held that the question raised in the minute could not be entertained, as it did not form the subject of the petitioners' application.

By clause 21 of the scheme settled by the Educational Endowments Commissioners for the administration of the "Innerpeffray Mortification," it was provided that the governors might grant the use of the school and teacher's house at Innerpeffray to the School Board of Muthill, and might pay to that School Board the annual sum of £15, under the condition that they should keep the school and teacher's house in repair, and should maintain a school there.

No. 192.

July 14, 1897.
School Board
of Crieff.

1ST DIVISION.

At the date of this scheme the school and teacher's house were situated in the parish of Monzie and quoad sacra parish of Muthill, and were under the administration of the School Board of Muthill, but the part of the parish in which they were situated was subsequently transferred by the Boundary Commissioners to the parish of Crieff.

The School Board of Crieff having obtained the consent of the governors of the mortification, the School Board of Muthill, and of the Scotch Education Department, petitioned the Court to amend the scheme for the administration of the mortification, by substituting in clause 21 the name of the School Board of Crieff for that of the School Board of Muthill, and by reducing the sum payable by the governors from £15 to £10, the former sum having been found more than sufficient to pay the usual charges of the school.

A remit was made to Mr Bremner P. Lee, advocate, to report on the petition.

From Mr Lee's report it appeared that he had been called upon by Mr Haldane, one of the governors of the mortification, who had objected to the annual sum of £10 being paid to the petitioners, and requested him to report fully on the question whether that payment should be made, but that the reporter had not thought it his duty to enter on this inquiry, as the petition was merely for the removal of an administrative difficulty.

Mr Haldane subsequently lodged a minute, in which he craved the Court "to remit back the petition to the reporter to report upon the question whether any part of the grant of £15 per annum . . .
 should be paid to the School Board of the parish of Crieff."

The petitioners opposed the remit, on the ground that it was incompetent to entertain the question raised by the minute under the present application.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petition in this application is not by the Governors of the Innerpeffray Mortification, but by the School Board of the parish of Crieff. Owing to the change made by the Boundary Commissioners the School Board of the parish of Crieff, instead of the School Board of Muthill, is the natural recipient of the grant from the Innerpeffray Mortification—I say the natural recipient according to the view embodied in the scheme settled in 1888. Now, the petitioners say that they do not require £15 a year, but that £10 is enough for their needs, and accordingly their present proposal is that we should make the requisite change in the recipient of the grant, and limit the amount to their avowed requirements.
 Now, the minuter takes the occasion of this change being made to say that he is very much dissatisfied with the scheme, because in his view none of the money should go away from the library. That question may be an appropriate subject for another application to the Court, but what we do to-day, if we affirm the report and grant the application, will not affect the

No. 192. reconsideration of the question whether any of the money should be kept for the school, or whether all of it should be applied to the library. That question does not form the subject of this application, has not been submitted to the Scotch Education Department, or anything of the kind, and I think we cannot entertain it.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNENAR concurred.

THE COURT altered the scheme as craved.

DRUMMOND & REID, S.S.C.—W. & F. HALDANE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 193. WILLIAM BAIKIE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Watt—A. M. Anderson.
 JOHN WORDIE AND OTHERS (Wordie's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—W. C. Smith—Cook.

July 14, 1897.
 Baikie v.
 Wordie's
 Trustees.

Reparation—Landlord and Tenant—Defective Drainage.—In an action of damages by a tenant against his landlord for loss arising from defective drainage, the pursuer averred that the drainage of the house was defective; that the subjects let were old, and that the drains had not been examined for seven years; further, that for many years prior to his occupation the premises had been occupied, and "complaints have been made to the defender by previous tenants regarding the insanitary condition of the premises." Held that the last averment was not sufficiently specific to be admitted to probation, and that quoad ultra there was no relevant averment of fault on the part of the landlord.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord Kin-
 cairney.

WILLIAM BAIKIE, bird-dealer and grocer, obtained a lease of the house and shop, 20 Cables Wynd, Leith, from John Wordie and others, the trustees of the late William Wordie, at an annual rent of £16, 10s. per annum. He raised this action against the landlord, concluding for £300 as damages sustained by him from the defective drainage of the premises.

The pursuer averred (cond. 2) that he had received a verbal undertaking from the defenders' factor that the premises would be put into a healthy condition. "For many years prior to the pursuer's occupation the premises had been occupied, by different tenants, as a house and shop. Complaints have been made to the defenders by previous tenants regarding the insanitary condition of the premises." (Cond. 3) "The pursuer took possession of the said premises on 28th May 1896, and placed in the shop his stock in trade, consisting of, inter alia, a number of fancy birds which were of considerable value. No sooner were the birds placed in the said premises than they began to droop and pine away. In a few days all the birds had died. The pursuer informed the defenders of what had occurred, and they sent a plumber who examined and made some repairs on the gas-pipes in the premises." (Cond. 4) "When the plumber had finished his work the pursuer got another lot of birds, but they also drooped and died in the same way, and in about the same length of time as the first lot. This happened about the end of June 1896, and the pursuer again informed the defenders of what had occurred. They again sent a plumber to examine and repair the gas-pipes." (Cond. 5) "The pursuer got a third lot of birds about September 1896, but once again the birds drooped and died." (Cond. 6) "In addition to the birds, the pursuer shortly after he entered the premises placed in stock 100 fancy fishes. Within two days the fishes were all dead. After the

No. 193.

July 14, 1897.
Baikie v.
Wordie's
Trustees.

second repair of the gas-pipes, the pursuer placed in stock a second lot of 100 fancy fishes, but they also died on the premises within two days of their being placed there. . . . The pursuer further averred that in October he applied to the burgh engineer, who had the drains examined, and reported that the drains were in bad order, and allowed sewage-gas to pervade the premises. (Cond. 10) "When the defenders were made aware of the burgh engineer's report on the state of the drains, they instructed a bricklayer named Shaw to put the drains into repair. Some work was done by Mr Shaw upon the drains, but he failed to check the escape of sewer-gas or the prevalence of bad smells. The pursuer finding the situation unbearable removed his family to another house in November 1896. He could not get a shop till December, when he secured one at 12 Coburg Street, Leith. Admitted that the rent has not been paid. Explained that no demand for the rent was ever made by the defenders. . . ." (Cond. 11) "The defenders were in fault in failing to put the premises into a tenantable and healthy condition at the commencement of the pursuer's tenancy, as they were bound to do. They also failed to repair the floor and plaster the room as stipulated in the missives. The condition of the premises was such that the defenders ought to have known that repair of the drains was necessary before the premises could be occupied with safety. The buildings are old, and the drains had not been examined for seven years. At that time the drains were not renewed, but merely patched up in a rough-and-ready way. These facts were known to the defenders, and ought to have put them on their guard to see that at the commencement of a new lease or tenancy the premises were made fit for human habitation. The death of the birds and fishes ought to have been a sufficient warning to the defenders that the drains were bad, but until the burgh engineer had reported they did nothing to the drains, but merely sent a man to repair the gas-pipes."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having suffered damage through the fault and negligence of the defenders is entitled to reparation therefor.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons.

On 29th June 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law for the defender as a plea to exclude the action, reserving it quoad ultra; and before further answer, allows the parties a proof of their respective averments."*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer may have extreme difficulty in proving this case, and if he fails to prove it, there may possibly be hardship on the defenders. But I have been unable to see that the risk of such hardship can be avoided, or that the case can be thrown out without inquiry. The notion of birds and fish being killed through drainage-gas is a novelty, and at first sight seems an absurdity. But the pursuer has averred that that happened; and whether it did or not is a question of fact, which I am not entitled to decide without proof merely from a strong impression that it is extremely improbable. The averments are far from satisfactory; still they seem to be relevant. Both parties, as I understand, preferred a proof to a trial by jury. As I think there should be inquiry, it is better that I should say very little on the law of the case, but I refer to Erskine, ii. 6, 43; to Goskirk v. The Edinburgh Railways Station Access Company, 19th De-

No. 193. The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—A tenant might remove from an unhealthy house, and refuse to pay rent, but he could not claim damages for injuries arising from insanitary conditions without specific averments and proof of fault on the landlord's part. There was no right to damages against the landlord ex dominio.¹ There was no relevant averment of fault. A general averment of previous complaints was insufficient. The specific complaints and the names of the complainers should have been stated. The averment of fault in cond. 11 was irrelevant. It was not enough to say that the defenders ought to have known of the defect. The pursuer made it clear that whenever the defenders were advised of the defect they sent a proper tradesman to remedy it. They thus discharged their duty. At the most it was clear that the pursuer was as much aware of the defects of the premises as the defenders, and yet he remained in the premises. He had thus lost any right to damages.²

July 14, 1897.
Baikie v.
Wordie's
Trustees.

Argued for the pursuer;—There was relevant averment of fault. The defenders had been warned by previous tenants; they knew the premises were old and had not been examined for seven years, when they were only roughly patched; they were in such circumstances bound to anticipate defects. When the pursuer's stock in trade died the defenders were put on their inquiry, and should have had the premises examined. In any case they failed to repair properly after receiving the burgh engineer's report. Insufficient repairs did not discharge their obligation.³ In the case of *Henderson*⁴ the particular defect was not stated, and the alleged death was not properly connected with the defect. The pursuer in this case had made specific statements of the defect and the result ensuing therefrom. To remain in the premises did not necessarily bar a tenant from recovering damages.⁵

During the argument the pursuer's counsel were asked if they desired to make specific statements regarding the complaints made by previous tenants. They stated that they did not wish to amend the record.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think it is necessary to call for any further argument. I should have been disposed to do so if the Lord Ordinary had proceeded to cite Macph. 383; M'Nee v. Brown & Company, 24th June 1889, 26 S. L. R. 459; and to Lord Kyllachy's judgment in Maitland v. Allan, 28th October 1896, 34 S. L. R. 148, as indicating the grounds on which I have sustained the relevancy of the averments.

"The defenders have stated a plea to title. I understand that that plea is pointed at the pursuer's statement that his wife and children have suffered in their health. The defenders submitted that the pursuer had no title to sue for damages done to them, which could only be recovered in an action of damages by themselves. That plea, however, relates rather to the amount of damages than to title.

"In allowing a proof in general terms, I mean to leave all questions of relevancy and competency open, and not to decide whether the pursuer is entitled to prove injury to his wife and children, or that he can affect by parole evidence the contract constituted by written offer and acceptance."

¹ Ersk. Instit. ii. 6, 43; Hamilton, 1667, M. 10,121; Henderson v. Munn, July 7, 1888, 15 R. 859.

² Webster v. Brown, May 12, 1892, 19 R. 765.

³ Maitland v. Allan, Oct. 28, 1896, 34 S. L. R. 148.

⁴ Henderson v. Munn, 15 R. 859.

⁵ Shields v. Dalziel, May 14, 1897, 34 S. L. R. 635; Hall v. Hubner, May 29, 1897, 34 S. L. R. 653.

nounced any opinion upon the question of relevancy, but he informs us that by his interlocutor he means to leave all questions of relevancy and competency open.

No. 193.
July 14, 1897.
Baikie v.
Wordie's
Trustees.

I think this case is irrelevant. It is an action at the instance of a tenant who took a house and shop at a rent of £16, 10s. from Whitsunday 1896 to Whitsunday 1897. He remained in the house and shop till November 1896. I should wish to point out with regard to his leaving in November 1896, that I mean to say nothing here with regard to the right of a tenant to leave a house and to have the cost of removing, and also the possible increase of rent he may have to pay, if he can shew good cause for removing. But there is no averment here as to that. I put the question, What was the expense of removing? And the answer was that it was not known. I also asked, Is the rent paid for the new house and shop greater, and if so how much? And the answer was that it was not known. There is no case here stated for recovery of the cost of removing to another house or of extra rent. Plainly, any action on these grounds could only have been for a sum which could not have been sued for in this Court. I proceed therefore to deal with this case as an action of damages for the death of canaries and fishes, and for injury to the pursuer's own health, and the health of his wife and family. The sum sued for is £300, nearly twenty times the amount of the yearly rent. I am of opinion that such an action can only rest on actionable culpa, and that culpa must be plainly set forth on the record. Notice was taken of an averment contained in article 2 of the pursuer's condescendence—"For many years prior to the pursuer's occupation the premises had been occupied by different tenants as a house and shop. Complaints have been made to the defenders by previous tenants regarding the insanitary condition of the premises." If that was meant to suggest, and apparently it was, that the landlord was to blame, that there was culpa on his part because he had let an uninhabitable house in knowledge, on account of warnings that he had received, that it was unhealthy, there ought to be specification as to who made the complaints and what they were, and if they were to be proved, these details could have been given and ought to have been given. An opportunity was offered for amending the record by adding these particulars, but the pursuer's advisers are not prepared to amend, they prefer to take a judgment on the record as it stands. Now, taking it as it stands, besides the averment which I have read, and which I think insufficient, we have nothing except that the buildings and drains were old, and that the drains had not been examined for seven years. There is nothing actionable in a landlord letting a house in that state. It is said that when the first lot of birds died the pursuer informed the defenders. Both the pursuer and the defenders then thought the death of the birds was due to some defect in the gas-pipes, which were examined and repaired, and both landlords and tenant were satisfied that everything had been done which was required. The tenant was satisfied with what had been done, having all the knowledge as to the condition of the premises that the landlords had. A second and third lot of birds were brought in and died, and there were further examinations, and at last it was found that the drainage was defective. I have said that that might have entitled the tenant to go into a new house, and to have an action for

No. 193. the cost of removing and for any additional rent paid. I have explained the reasons why we cannot deal with that question here. I am of opinion that there are no averments here which would sustain an action of any other kind—any action of damages on the ground of culpa on the part of the landlord. I think, therefore, that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and dismiss the action.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Sustain the second plea in law for the defenders: Therefore dismiss the action, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.

J. B. W. LEE, S.S.C.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 194.

JOHN CAMPBELL SMITH, Pursuer (Appellant).—Rankine—M'Lennan.

July 14, 1897.
Baikie v.
Wordie's
Trustees.

W. J. HENDERSON, Defender (Respondent).—Hunter.

Landlord and Tenant—Obligation of tenant to occupy premises let—Damage to premises from leaving them unoccupied—Relevancy.—The landlord of a dwelling-house raised an action of damages against the tenant, and averred that the defender, without the pursuer's knowledge, left the house for seven months entirely unoccupied and uncared for, without fire or cleaning, and exposed to damp, frost, and dirt, greatly to the permanent injury of the house and its chances of finding another tenant; that one of the water-pipes burst and ran for days, to the injury of the floor, paper, and walls; and that the windows were broken because of the filthy, deserted appearance of the house, and because of its being left without protection. Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

JOHN CAMPBELL SMITH, advocate, one of the Sheriff-substitutes of Forfarshire, raised this action against W. J. Henderson, formerly tenant of the pursuer in the dwelling-house, No. 16 Nelson Street, Edinburgh, concluding for payment of £50 as damages for injury caused by him to said house.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 3) "Notwithstanding that the defender was tenant of the said house, and as such bound to keep it properly plenished and in good order, so far as reasonable care of the occupant could keep it in good order, he, in or about October 1894, deserted the house, and took up his abode in a cottage at a place called Lothian Bridge, said to be in the neighbourhood of Dalkeith. He, without pursuer's knowledge, left the house entirely unoccupied and uncared for, from in or about October 1894 to Whitsunday 1895, without fire or cleaning, and exposed to damp, frost, and dirt, greatly to the permanent injury of the house and its chances of finding another tenant. One of the water-pipes burst and ran for days, to the injury of the floor, paper, and walls. The windows were broken because of the filthy, deserted appearance of the house, and because of its being left without protection. He removed from said 16 Nelson Street all his own furniture to said cottage in the country, or to some other place or places to the pursuer unknown, and he also carried off, without lawful title, a number of articles belonging to pursuer. He knew that a variety of articles in the house belonged to the pursuer, but, in his irregular and lawless process of fitting, he gave the pursuer no opportunity of preventing his proceedings, as to his own effects, or of preventing the abstraction of articles that were not his own, and which, when once removed, could with difficulty be traced and identified. The defender's statements ostensibly in answer, so far as inconsistent with the pursuer's, are denied, except that it is admitted that pursuer gladly consented to the subletting of the house, but not to its being left untenanted; that the defender left the keys in the care of Messrs Clapperton, for the purpose of shewing or subletting the house and discharging the other ordinary duties of factor. The pursuer, about February 1895, as he knew that they had been trying to let the house, authorised them to act for him also. He borrowed the front door keys from them on two or at most three occasions, and returned them on each occasion within two hours. . . .

No. 194.

July 14, 1897.
Smith v.
Henderson.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The defender having, in breach of his obligations as a tenant, deserted and displenished the house let by pursuer to him, and left the house without fire, cleaning, or care, for many months, to the injury of the house, ought to be found liable in damages.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant.

On 11th March 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Maconochie) found, inter alia, that article 3 of the pursuer's condescendence was irrelevant.*

* "NOTE.—I have found it exceedingly difficult to come to a conclusion on the question whether there is any damage for which the defender may be liable relevantly averred in the condescendence, owing to the extremely discursive way in which the pursuer has set forth his case. The libel concludes for payment of £50. In February 1878 the pursuer let his house, 16 Nelson Street, to the defender and his two aunts. There were a number of fittings, gas-brackets, grates, &c., left in the house by the pursuer, for the use of which the leasees were to pay £6, 10s. per annum. The first ground of damage stated (cond. 3) is that, in October 1894, the defender, who is now the sole tenant, left the house unoccupied and uncared for until Whitsunday 1895, 'without fire or cleaning, and exposed to damp, frost, and dirt, greatly to the permanent injury of the house, and its chances of finding another tenant.' The damage first averred is that during the tenant's absence 'one of the water-pipes burst and ran for days, to the injury of the floor, paper, and walls.' Now, it is not stated when this burst occurred, and the pursuer admits that he had given permission to the defender to sublet, and that 'the defender left the keys in the care of Messrs Clapperton for the purpose of shewing or subletting the house, and discharging the ordinary duties of factors. The pursuer, about February 1895, as he knew they had been trying to let the house, authorised them to act for him also.' I do not think the averment of damage is relevant. It is not said when the burst occurred, and it may quite well have been during the time when Messrs Clapperton were acting as joint factors for the pursuer and for the defender. The averment of the damage done is also very vague; it is not said on which floor the burst occurred, or even approximately which walls were damaged. The defender was not in the house at the time, and he is not stated to have seen the damage at the time. He is, I think, entitled to know the exact case he has to meet, and ought not to be made to meet a loosely stated case, under which almost any damage appearing on the walls of the house might be proved and attributed to the burst pipe. The only other item of damage stated as having followed on the house being left empty is that 'the windows were broken because of the filthy, deserted

No. 194. The Sheriff (Rutherford) on appeal, adhered.

July 14, 1897.
Smith v.
Henderson.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—A tenant was bound to occupy premises let to him, and to give them the benefit arising from care and use. This was an implied term of the contract, and a breach of it rendered him liable in damages.¹ The pursuer had relevantly averred such a breach. The Clappertons were only the joint agents of the pursuer to secure another tenant, not to take care of the house. This was the clear statement of the pursuer.

Argued for the defender;—The pursuer's averments were irrelevant. It must be inferred that he knew of the vacation of the premises, and he must be taken to have acquiesced in this. He stated that he was willing that the house should be sublet. The bursting of the pipe would have injured the house even although it had been occupied, and there was no averment that more damage had ensued from the fact of the tenant's absence. The windows were not broken through the fault of the defender. There was no authority for the proposition that the tenant of a dwelling-house was responsible for damage caused by his temporary absence, much less would such liability be reasonable when the damage arose from accident. The blame truly lay with the Clappertons, who ought to have supervised the house as joint agents.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think it necessary to call for any further argument. I am of opinion that article 3 is relevant, and that the interlocutor of the Sheriff, which refuses proof of article 3, must be recalled.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT remitted to the Sheriff to allow the pursuer a proof of his averments, inter alia, in article 3 of the condensation.

DANIEL TURNER, S.L.—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 195.

July 14, 1897.
Todd v. Wood.

MRS ANN TODD (Claimant), Respondent.—Crole.

WILLIAM JAMES WOOD (Douglas's Trustee), Appellant.—Craigie.

Stamp—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39), secs. 33 (1), 101 (1), and First Schedule, voce Agreement—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), secs. 3, 10, 89—Document shewing state of account between parties not requiring a stamp.—A, a claimant in a sequestration, produced a document in the following terms:—"Borrowed from A, £67 Pounds, July 1878. Paid back £5 Pounds, May 1885. Leaving a balance of £62 Pounds to pay still." The document was holograph of and signed by the bankrupt, but was neither dated nor stamped. Held that the document was neither a promissory-note, nor an agreement, nor a receipt, within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that it might be received as an item of evidence in support of A's claim without a stamp.

appearance of the house, and because of its being left without protection.' Again, there are no dates or particulars of damage given, and further, the relation of cause and effect seems to be much too vague to be admitted to probaton. . . ."

¹ Graham v. Stevenson, Feb. 21, 1792, Hume's Decisions, 781; White-law v. Fulton, Nov. 1, 1871, 10 Macph. 27.

MRS ANN TODD, Cowhill, Rickarton, a claimant in the sequestration of John Douglas, mason, lodged the following account along with her affidavit :—

No. 195.
July 14, 1897.
Todd v. Wood.

" 1885.

" May. Balance of sum lent to bankrupt as per acknowledgment 2^d Division.

produced,	£62	0	0	Sheriff of Perthshire.
---------------------	-----	---	---	------------------------

" Add interest on same,	34	2	0
-----------------------------------	----	---	---	--

£96	2	0"
------------	----------	-----------

The acknowledgment produced was in these terms :—

" Borrowed from Mrs Todd £67 Pounds, July 1878.

" Paid back £5 Pounds, May 1885.

" Leaving a balance of £62 Pounds to pay still.

" JOHN DOUGLAS."

This acknowledgment was alleged to be holograph of the bankrupt, and to be signed by him. It was written in pencil; it was not dated, and it was unstamped.

On 6th May 1897 the trustee in the sequestration, W. J. Wood, accountant, Perth, issued the following judgment :—" In respect that the acknowledgment of the loan is neither dated nor stamped, and that no information is supplied as to the alleged loan by the claimant, who is, the trustee understands, related to the bankrupt,—the trustee rejects the same."

The claimant appealed to the Sheriff, and on 28th May 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Grahame) pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that said document not being an agreement or bond, or other document requiring to be stamped, but being a mere acknowledgment of debt, is, though unstamped, to be received as an item of evidence, which entitles the appellant to obtain an opportunity of adducing further evidence in support of her alleged debt: Therefore recalls said deliverance of the respondent, and remits to him to take such further evidence as the appellant may wish to adduce in support of her said claim: Finds the respondent liable in £3, 3s. of expenses, and decerns."*

* "NOTE.—The proper course to be taken by the trustee in regard to the case in question appears to me to be to receive the document of alleged debt which the appellant has produced with her claim as being in itself a valid item of evidence, and to allow her an opportunity for adducing such further proof as she may offer in support of her claim. The document in question appears to me to be a mere acknowledgment of debt, which requires no stamp. In the case of Welsh's Trustees v. Forbes, 18th March 1885, 12 R. 851, a document very similar to the one in question was, no doubt, dealt with under the judgment of a majority of the Judges of the Second Division of the Court of Session as being an agreement, and was accordingly stamped before it was given effect to; but in the judgment given in that case there were decided differences of opinion on the part of the Judges as to the actual legal character of the document—Lord Rutherford Clark holding that it should be dealt with as a receipt, while Lord Young held that it was a mere acknowledgment of debt, and the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craig-hill being of opinion that it was an agreement or bond. The judgment pronounced by the Court in giving effect to the document before them, which was an unstamped document in the following terms :—" Received from Thomas Welsh, Esquire, on loan, £400.—R. Thomson Forbes, 10th November 1881," cannot, I think, be held to have authoritatively determined

No. 195. The trustee appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—The document required a stamp, and could not be considered. It was a promissory-note.¹ When no date of payment was stated payment on demand was implied.² Section 10 of the Bills of Exchange Act applied to promissory-notes as well as bills, as clearly appeared from section 89 (1) of that Act. Absence of date did not invalidate a bill.³ A document of similar character had been held a promissory-note.⁴ At least the document was a promissory-note in the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891.⁵ If not a promissory-note, it was a receipt under the Stamp Act, section 10 (1).⁶ *Welsh's Trustees*⁶ proceeded on the Stamp Act, 1870, but this was really in the same terms as the Act of 1891. Or the document was an agreement or bond in terms of the Stamp Act, 1891, first schedule, voce Agreement, and was not admissible without a 6d. stamp, and a penalty of £10.

Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—I think we can only deal with this case in so far as it has been decided upon by the trustee. The trustee rejected the claim on the ground "that the acknowledgment of the loan is neither dated nor stamped, what the legal character of the document was. The judgment of the Court did not give any express finding as to the character of the document, but was merely to the effect 'that counsel for the pursuer having stated they were willing to treat the document as an agreement, and the stamp-duty of sixpence and the penalty of £10, together with the sum of £1, having been consigned in the hands of the Clerk of Court in terms of the statute, the Court repelled the defences.' Lord Young, while concurring in the judgment of the Court, said,—'If this document had contained an obligation to pay, it would have been a bond and would have required a bond stamp. My opinion is that it requires no stamp, that it is a mere acknowledgment of debt, which may be conclusive or not according to circumstances.' Lord Young's opinion appears to me to apply equally to the document in the present case, and in recalling the deliverance of the respondent I have proceeded upon the ground that that learned Judge's opinion sets forth the true character of such a document as the one now in question, and the effect which the defender is therefore entitled to claim for it as an item of evidence in support of the claim which she makes for a ranking on the bankrupt's estate."

¹ Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 83 (1).

² Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 10 (1) (b).

³ Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 3 (4) (a).

⁴ Vallance v. Forbes, June 27, 1879, 6 R. 1099.

⁵ The Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39), enacts as follow, sec. 33 (1) :—"For the purposes of this Act, the expression 'promissory-note' includes any document or writing (except a bank-note) containing a promise to pay any sum of money." Section 101 (1) "For the purposes of this Act, the expression 'receipt' includes any note, memorandum, or writing whereby any money amounting to two pounds or upwards, or any bill of exchange or promissory-note for money amounting to two pounds or upwards, is acknowledged or expressed to have been received or deposited or paid. . . ." First schedule,—“Agreement, or any memorandum of an agreement, made in England or Ireland under hand only, or made in Scotland without any clause of registration, and not otherwise specifically charged with any duty, whether the same be only evidence of a contract or obligatory upon the parties from its being a written instrument—6d."

⁶ Welsh's Trustees v. Forbes, March 18, 1885, 12 R. 851, per Lord Rutherford Clark, p. 860.

and that no information is supplied as to the alleged loan by the claimant, who is, the trustee understands, related to the bankrupt." The Sheriff-substitute recalled that deliverance, and found that said document, not being an agreement or bond, or other document requiring to be stamped, but being a mere acknowledgment of debt, is, though unstamped, to be received as an item of evidence, which entitles the appellant to an opportunity of adducing further evidence in support of her alleged debt. The argument against the Sheriff-substitute's finding and in support of the trustee's deliverance is, that the document produced is either a promissory-note, a receipt, or an agreement, or bond. I am of opinion that it is not a promissory-note. I am also of opinion that it is not a receipt, or an agreement, or a bond. Of course I mean that it is none of these things within the meaning of the Stamp Act. I am further of opinion that it does not require any stamp. What its force may be as establishing a debt against the bankrupt's estate I do not know. I have not to form any judgment or express any opinion on that point. It may or it may not establish the claimant's claim of debt in whole or in part. All I can give an opinion upon is that it ought not to be rejected because it has not a promissory-note, or a receipt, or an agreement, or bond stamp upon it. I think the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor should be adhered to. It decides nothing more than that this document is to be received as an item of evidence in support of the claim. I say nothing for or against the contention that it is sufficient to establish the claim. We cannot be called upon to decide that question, for it has not been decided by the trustee. I therefore suggest that we should refuse the appeal, with expenses.

No. 195.

July 14, 1897.
Todd v. Wood.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think the grounds on which the trustee proceeded in rejecting this claim are untenable. If it be the case, as the trustee understands, that the claimant and the bankrupt are conjunct and confident, that will afford a good reason for the trustee exercising his right to call for further evidence or explanation before admitting this claim to a ranking. But it is not a ground for rejecting the claim de plano.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. I think this document is neither a promissory-note, nor a receipt, nor an agreement, within the meaning of the Stamp Act. It is plainly only a jotting or note shewing the state of account between the parties, written a long time after the loan was made. It may or may not of itself be conclusive evidence of the subsistence of a debt, but I agree that that is a matter which the trustee must decide for himself. All we decide is that the writing is competent evidence of loan, and should be received and considered though unstamped. I think we should sustain the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and remit the case to the trustee.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal, and affirm the interlocutor appealed against: Find the appellant liable in expenses, and remit the same to the Auditor," &c.

CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—W. B. RAINNIE, S.S.O.—Agents.

No. 196.

July 15, 1897.
Brown's
Trustees v.
Hay.

MRS ALICE CATHERINE BROWN AND OTHERS (Brown's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Salvesen.
JAMES HAY, Defender (Reclaimer).—Jameson—John Wilson.

Process—Summons—Action by separate pursuers for lump sum of damages—Amendment—Competency.—A's testamentary trustees, and B, a member of a dissolved firm, who had acted as A's law-agents, brought an action against C, who had been employed by A as an accountant, concluding for delivery of documents belonging to the trust-estate and for payment "to the pursuers" of £100 as damages. The pursuers alleged that C had been employed by A to audit the accounts of his business, and had also been employed to wind up the affairs of B's firm; that in these capacities he had obtained possession of documents having reference to the business carried on sometime by A and afterwards by his trustees, and that in breach of his duty he had communicated information so obtained to third parties, to the damage of the pursuers.

The defender objected that the action was incompetent, being at the instance of separate pursuers for payment of a lump sum of damages.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that it was competent to amend the summons by concluding for payment to the pursuers, A's trustees, instead of to the pursuers generally.

Opinion by the Lord President that the conclusion for damages as originally framed was not incompetent, in respect that the condescendence shewed that the sole claim made was based on alleged injury to the trustees, and that there was no combination of heterogeneous claims to found a demand for payment of one sum to the pursuers generally.

Opinion by Lord McLaren that the discretion of the Lord Ordinary in allowing amendments of the record was not intended to be subject to review, except on the ground that he had exceeded his power under the statute.

1st Division.
Ld Stormonth-
Darling.

THIS was an action at the instance of Mrs Brown, Ralph Compton Cameron, and others, the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of William Brown, of Dunkinty, and Ralph Compton Cameron, one of the trustees as an individual, against James Hay, accountant in Elgin. The conclusions of the action were (1) for delivery to the pursuers of all documents or copies of documents, having reference to the business of distillers sometime carried on by the deceased William Brown, and now by the pursuers at Linkwood Glenlivet Distillery, Elgin, including all extracts, excerpts, or copies made from the books or papers of the business by the defender between 1880 and 1893, during which period the defender audited the books and accounts of the distillery; (2) for interdict against the defender communicating to third parties without the pursuers' consent or to their prejudice, any information relating to the affairs of the distillery, obtained by him while acting as auditor; and (3) for payment "to the pursuers" of £500 as damages.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 2) The defender was cashier for over twenty years of the late firm of Cameron & Allan, solicitors, Elgin, of which the pursuer Mr R. C. Cameron was a partner. The business was carried on until 1895, when it was wound up by mutual consent of the surviving partners. The defender was appointed to wind up the business of the firm. (Cond. 3) " . . . From about 1880 until 1893 the defender was employed by Mr Brown through said firm of Cameron & Allan, to make up and audit the accounts of the distillery." (Cond. 4) "While acting as auditor of said distillery, the defender had full access to all the books and documents belonging to the distillery and relating to its affairs, and he thereby obtained information on private and confidential matters connected with the business of the distillery. As liquidator of the dissolved firm of Cameron & Allan the defender also obtained possession of numerous documents and papers belonging to the said firm as clients thereof. Amongst said papers the pursuers believe and aver were some which were prepared in connection with the business of the Linkwood Glenlivet Distillery, belonging to them, and which had come into the possession of Cameron & Allan as agents for the late Mr Brown. It was the duty of the defender not to use said information except for the purposes of his employment, and to refrain from communicating to third parties any information with regard to the business of said distillery which he had acquired while acting as auditor of its books and accounts, or which had come to his knowledge as liquidator of said firm of Cameron & Allan." (Cond. 5) In breach of his duty the defender made copies or extracts of the books, accounts, and documents, relating to the distillery business, which he retained when his duties as auditor terminated. (Cond. 6) Further, in breach of his duty the defender had maliciously used these copies and excerpts so as to communicate to third parties the information therein contained.

No. 196.
—
July 15, 1897.
Brown's
Trustees v.
Hay.

The pursuers further averred that they had been put to great trouble and expense on account of his disclosures.

The defender denied that he had made any communications to third parties in breach of his duty.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The action is incompetent as laid. (3) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant.

After the record had been closed the pursuers lodged a minute craving the Lord Ordinary to allow them to amend the summons by inserting after the word "pursuers" in the third conclusion of the summons the words "the trustees foresaid," and to make certain corresponding alterations on their averments and pleas in law.

On 1st July 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) allowed the pursuers to amend the summons in terms of the minute of amendment, and before answer allowed the parties a proof of their averments.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The conclusion for payment of damages was incompetent, being at the instance of separate pursuers with separate grounds of action for payment of a lump sum of damages.¹ (2) The amendment on the summons proposed by the pursuers should not have been allowed. Its effect was to substitute a new pursuer, the trustees, for the joint pursuers at whose instance the action had originally been brought. It thus enlarged the scope of the summons, because by substituting a several claim for a joint one, it thus increased the damages due to the trustees, while it left Cameron in a position to raise another action. The amendment therefore was a contravention of the Court of Session Act.² Further, assuming the competency of the amendment, the question whether it should be allowed was for the discretion of the Court,³ and, in the circumstances, this amendment should not be allowed. [The LORD

¹ Gibson v. Macquean, Dec. 5, 1866, 5 Macph. 113, 39 Scot. Jur. 56; Mitchell v. Grierson, Jan. 13, 1894, 21 R. 367; Harkes v. Mowat, March 4, 1862, 24 D. 701, 34 Scot. Jur. 348; Smyth v. Muir, Nov. 13, 1891, 19 R. 81; Fischer & Co. v. Andersen, Jan. 15, 1896, 23 R. 395.

² 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 10, sec. 29; Turnbull v. Veitch, July 18, 1889, 16 R. 1079.

³ Taylor v. M'Dougall & Sons, July 15, 1885, 12 R. 1304.

No. 196. PRESIDENT referred to the cases of Leny v. Magistrates of Dunfermline and Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans.¹ (3) The action was irrelevant.

July 15, 1897.
Brown's
Trustees v.
Hay.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The action was competent in its original form, only one ground of damage being alleged. The defender had no interest to object to the original form of the summons, his only interest being to get a good discharge from the claim, and that he could get, because all the parties having a possible claim against him were present. (2) The Court would be slow to interfere with the Lord Ordinary's discretion in allowing an amendment. Further, the amendment in this case had been rightly allowed. It made no change in the amount claimed, and introduced no new pursuer. It was competent, and must be allowed. (3) The action was relevant.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is said first by the reclamer that this summons as it stood was incompetent; and he goes on to say that this amendment was outside the provisions of the section of the Court of Session Act. I think both these propositions are wrong.

In the first place, the action must not be regarded as solely an action for the recovery of money, because the leading conclusion is for delivery of documents. I will take in the first place Brown's trustees' case. It is said by Brown's trustees,—“Under the contract which our truster entered into with you, the defender, certain papers were put into your possession. Now, contrary to the contract, which we are in right of, you retained these documents, and, what is worse, are making a bad use of them; and we ask that you be ordered to give them back.”

Now, supposing the trustees, from some legal scruple, which may be unfounded in reason, chose to associate with themselves in their summons for the recovery of these writs their law-agent, I do not see anything incompetent in their asking that delivery be made to them and their nominees, in place of solely delivery to themselves; and therefore it seems to me it cannot be maintained that, in any view, the summons was incompetent, because the objection is really untenable as applied, at all events, to the first conclusion. If the action had been incompetent as to the petitory conclusion the proper result would have been, not the dismissal of the whole action, but the dismissal of the petitory conclusion. But as regards that conclusion, I am not at all satisfied that the action was incompetent; indeed, I think it was competent enough. It is to be observed that there is not here any combination of heterogeneous claims to found a demand for payment of one sum indiscriminately to all the parties. You are to look at the ground of action to ascertain what the claim is, not only from the conclusions of the summons, but from the summons and the condescendence together, and you will consider what is the claim really made. As I take it, when the claim is scrutinised it is a claim for damage which has been done to the trustees, and the position of Mr Cameron really comes on examination to be this: that he has for some reason or other been put in the instance so as to obviate any objection that might be taken as to the rather confused circumstances in which the papers were at one time or another in the hands of the de- No. 196.

¹ Leny v. Magistrates of Dunfermline, March 20, 1894, 21 R. 749; Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans, Dec. 7, 1895, 23 R. 256.

fender.

But then I go on to say that I think if it should turn out that the summons was, on the face of it, incompetent owing to an error, the claim of damage, let us say, not being in express terms limited to persons who had suffered the damage, and supposing that that rendered the summons incompetent, yet, if it appeared to be, in the words of the statute, "an error or defect," I think,—and I see the Judges of the other Division have so held,—that the action can be made competent under the powers of the Court of Session Act; and therefore I think the Lord Ordinary has acted quite rightly. As I read the summons, the second claim submitted on record is a claim for injury to the trustees. That has been erroneously stated in the summons as yielding a money payment to all the pursuers instead of to the primary and proper pursuers. I think the Lord Ordinary was quite right in allowing that to be corrected.

July 15, 1897.
Brown's
Trustees v.
Hay.

When we turn to the question of relevancy, some of the same considerations arise. It is quite a mistake to suppose that the claim of damages is founded on this defender having, when in the employment of the legal firm, committed a wrong against the pursuers, because the leading averments of the condescendence, as I have already pointed out, set out the contract between the truster and defender, and the retaining of the papers as really a violation of the contract which they are now in right of. It is quite true that a more dubious part of the case is introduced by the statement that the defender was employed by Messrs Cameron & Allan as their liquidator, and that that afforded him free access to Brown's trustees' papers, and that he misused these papers which he had access to. It may or may not be that that is a good ground of action as adding more damages to the claim; but this is not the proper time to dissociate things which in statements are much interwoven. I have no doubt the Judge who tries the case will have his attention called to the difference in quality of these averments, and will be able to dissociate them, if, in his opinion, one should be good and the other bad, but on that question I pronounce no opinion all.

I think the case should go to trial, and I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in all that your Lordship has said, both as to the propriety of the amendment which the Lord Ordinary has allowed, and as to the relevancy. I will only add that I think there are strong reasons for considering that the power of amendment given to the Judge, or the Court under the Court of Session Act, is—I will not say a discretionary power—but a power to be exercised according to the personal judgment of the Judge or Court before whom the question may arise. My reason for saying so is partly this, that the power is to be exercised at any stage of the case; and in another part of the Act it is provided that, even in the course of a jury trial, the record and issues may be amended so as to enable the Court and jury to decide the true question in dispute. Now, it can hardly be supposed that a power which is to be exercised by a Judge in the progress of a

No. 196. trial is one that was intended to be subject to review on the question whether there was a proper case for the application of the statutory power. As review is not excluded, we must hold that if a legal question should arise, a question involving construction of the statutory power, that may be taken to review as has been done in this case. But, in my judgment, there is here no case of construction of the statute, but only a question whether the Lord Ordinary rightly applied the power given in the statute for the purpose of removing a difficulty in the statement of the case or making the pursuer's case more clear. Even if I differed from the Lord Ordinary, which I do not, I should not be prepared to interfere with his judgment in such a matter.

July 15, 1897.
Brown's
Trustees v.
Hay.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 197. DUNCAN STEWART, Pursuer (Respondent).—W. Campbell—Abel.
JULY 15, 1897. RODERICK FORBES AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—F. T. Cooper—Welsh.
Stewart v. Forbes.

Cautioner—Suspension—Caution for expenses—Personal liability of cautioner in suspension—Trust.—The complainer in a suspension of a charge upon a bill having died, his widow, one of his trustees, was at her own request sisted as complainer in his place as his "trustee," and found caution, her cautioner becoming bound "that she shall, as trustee foresaid, pay" the sum in the bill "in full in the event of there being a sufficiency of trust funds, or rateably along with the other creditors" of the truster "in the event of his estate proving insufficient to pay his creditors in full," and also "that payment shall be made of whatever sum the said Lords shall modify in name of damages and expenses in case of wrongous suspending." The Court ultimately repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the complainer liable in expenses "as trustee."

In an action by the charger against the cautioner, held (diss. Lord Young, aff. judgment of Lord Low) that whatever the liability of the complainer might be, the cautioner was liable to the charger in payment of the whole expenses.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.

ON 6th April 1896 Duncan Stewart, shipmaster, Leith, with consent of Wallace & Pennell, Writers to the Signet, for their interest, raised an action against Roderick Forbes, solicitor, Edinburgh, and Janet Cairns Welsh or Daily, widow of John Cameron Daily, shipmaster, Leith, concluding for decree against Forbes for the sum of £64, 14s. 8d., being the amount of expenses decerned for in a suspension in which Forbes was cautioner.

The action arose in the following circumstances:—

Daily, Mrs Daily's husband, having been charged to pay the sum of £100 and interest due under a bill drawn by the pursuer Stewart, and accepted by Daily, brought a suspension of the charge, and the note was passed on caution.

Daily died on 27th July 1895, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement under which Mrs Daily and others were appointed trustees.

Thereafter by interlocutor dated 6th September 1895 Mrs Daily was at her own request sisted as complainer in the suspension, "as trustee of the deceased John Cameron Daily," and appointed to find No. 197. caution "as trustee foresaid."

In pursuance of this interlocutor Forbes, the present defender, ^{July 15, 1897.} became cautioner for Mrs Daily. ^{Stewart v. Forbes.}

The bond of caution, which was dated 21st September 1895, was in the following terms:—

"I, Roderick Forbes, solicitor, 22 Castle Street, Edinburgh, bind and oblige myself, and my heirs, executors, and successors, as cautioners and surety acted in the books of Council and Session for Mrs Janet Cairns Welsh or Daily, residing in Gladstone Place, Leith, widow of John Cameron Daily, sometime of No. 24 Bernard Street, Leith, now deceased, trustee acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of the said John Cameron Daily, that she shall, as trustee foresaid, pay to Duncan Stewart, designed in the note of suspension after mentioned as shipmaster, Gladstone Place, Leith, but presently resident abroad, and Messieurs Wallace & Pennell, Writers to the Signet, Leith, his agents, for any interest they may have,—respondents, or to any other person to whom she shall be ordained to make payment, of the sum of £100 sterling, and the legal interest thereof since due and till paid, contained in and due by a bill dated the 9th day of January 1895 years, drawn by the said Duncan Stewart upon and accepted by the said John Cameron Daily, and payable four months after date, in full in the event of there being a sufficiency of trust-funds, or rateably along with the other creditors of the said John Cameron Daily in the event of the estate proving insufficient to pay his creditors in full; but declaring that this limitation of the obligation shall be without prejudice to any preference which the respondents may have already secured in a note of suspension between the said parties presented on the 4th day of July 1895 years, and that in case it shall be found by the Lords of Council and Session that she ought so to do, after discussing the passed note of suspension, and also that payment shall be made of whatever sum the said Lords shall modify in name of damages and expenses in case of wrongous suspending.—Consenting to the registration hereof in the books of Council and Session that letters of horning and all other execution may pass upon a decret to be interponed hereto in common form," &c.

On 26th November 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced the following interlocutor in the suspension:—"Repels the reasons of suspension: Finds the letters and charge orderly proceeded, and decerns: Finds the complainer, Mrs Janet Cairns Welsh or Daily, as trustee of John Cameron Daily, her husband, the original complainer, liable to the respondents in expenses: Allows an account of said expenses to be given in, and remits the same when lodged to the Auditor of Court to tax and report."

On 7th January 1896 the following further interlocutor was pronounced in the suspension:—"The Lord Ordinary approves of the Auditor's report on the respondents' account of: expenses, No. 34 of process, and decerns against the complainer for £64, 14s. 8d. sterling, the taxed amount thereof."

The present action was then brought.

The pursuers set forth the foregoing facts, and averred that payment of the expenses decerned for in the suspension had been demanded from Mrs Daily and Forbes, but had been refused.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender Roderick Forbes being bound, in terms of his bond of caution, to make payment to the pur-

No. 197. suer of the sum sued for, decree should be pronounced therefor, with expenses.
 July 15, 1897. The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The decerniture for expenses being against the defender Mrs Daily in her capacity of trustee only, the pursuer is not entitled to a personal decree, either against her or her cautioner.

Stewart v.
 Forbes.

On 19th March 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders, conform to the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses; allows an account," &c.*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—Forbes, as cautioner, was bound for Mrs Daily "as trustee" only, and as trustee she was not personally liable for the expenses of the suspension, the decerniture against her being "as trustee."¹ A cautioner could not be liable for a larger sum than his principal, otherwise he would be liable without a right of relief quoad the excess.²

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) Mrs Daily was personally liable for the expenses. She was a trustee, not a judicial factor, and the rule laid down in *Craig v. Hogg*¹ was confined to judicial factors, who were officers of Court, whereas testamentary trustees and executors were, at common law, liable to the full extent of their author's debts. (2) A cautioner might be liable for more than his principal, e.g., cautioners for minors acting without their curators.³ Cautioners in

* "OPINION.—The interlocutor in the suspension finds Mrs Daily, as trustee of John Cameron Daily, 'her husband, the original complainer, liable to the respondent in expenses.' I am inclined to think that the words which I have quoted are only descriptive and explanatory of how Mrs Daily became liable in expenses in a suspension which was brought by her husband, John Cameron Daily.

"Assuming, however, that the rule laid down in the case of Craig v. Hogg (24 R. p. 6) applies, and that the words in the interlocutor 'as trustee' limit Mrs Daily's liability to the extent of the trust-estate, I do not think that it forms a good defence to the cautioner.

"In the bond of caution there is a distinction between the obligation to pay the principal sum contained in the bill which was under suspension, and interest thereon, and the obligation undertaken for the expenses and damages in case of wrongous suspending. The obligation in regard to the principal sum is that Mrs Daily 'shall, as trustee foresaid, pay to Duncan Stewart, designed in the note of suspension as shipmaster, Gladstone Place, Leith, but presently resident abroad, the sum of £100 sterling, and the legal interest thereof since due and till paid, . . . in full in the event of there being a sufficiency of trust funds, or rateably along with the other creditors of the said John Cameron Daily in the event of his estate proving insufficient to pay his creditors in full.' The obligation as regards the principal sum, therefore, is simply that the estate shall be forthcoming.

"But as regards expenses and damages it is different. The cautioner binds himself 'that payment shall be made of whatever sum the said Lords shall modify in name of damages and expenses in case of wrongous suspending.'

"There is no limitation of liability there. The cautioner binds himself to see the sum which shall be modified as expenses paid. That sum is the amount of the account as taxed. I shall therefore give decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons."

¹ Craig v. Hogg, Oct. 17, 1896, supra, p. 6.

² Ersk. Inst. iii. 3, 64; Jackson v. M'Iver, July 6, 1875, 2 R. 882.

³ Stair, i. 17, 10; Ersk. Inst. iii. 3, 64.

suspension were also in this position. Many of the ordinary rules in regard to cautioners did not apply to them.¹ The Court made it a condition of execution being sisted that caution should be found for the very purpose of having someone liable absolutely in expenses in the event of suspension being refused. The charger did not desire a cautioner; he stood on his decree, but the Court, in suspending execution ad interim, insisted on caution being found in order to secure the charger in his expenses if he should ultimately be successful. (3) In any view, the cautioner was bound here on the terms of his bond. He bound himself for expenses simpliciter.

No. 197.

July 15, 1897.
Stewart v.
Forbes.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This action is raised for the purpose of obtaining decree for the amount of the expenses found due in a suspension in which the defender was the cautioner. The suspension was originally raised by one John Cameron Daily now deceased, and the note was passed on caution. He had not found caution at the time of his death, and his widow, who was by his trust-disposition and settlement appointed a trustee and executrix on his estate, sisted herself, and the defender was accepted as her cautioner. By the bond of caution the obligation as regards the principal sum is, that Mrs Daily shall, “as trustee foresaid,” pay to the respondents the sum contained in and due by the bill; and then there is a declaration saving any preference which the respondents may have secured. As regards the expenses, the obligation is, “that payment shall be made of whatever sum the said Lords shall modify in name of damages and expenses.”

In a suspension the complainer undertakes to find caution, if the Court think it right not to allow the suspension to be proceeded with unless caution be found—that is, caution that the intending charger shall not be in a worse position than he is at the time of the finding of the caution by not being able at once to charge upon his decree. Here the complainer who was sisted was in the position of trustee, and therefore, as regards the principal, not liable except in so far as there might be funds available in the executry estate to meet the claim. This is accordingly duly set forth in the passage I have read. It simply binds the cautioner to make the amount of the existing estate forthcoming, if the decree under which it is claimed is successfully maintained against the suspension.

But the conditions as regards expenses in the suspension seem to me to be different. The cautioner does not merely undertake that if there was estate in the hands of the suspender to meet both principal and expenses, that the expenses shall be paid, but his undertaking is expressed in language absolute and unrestricted. He undertakes that “payment shall be made” of these expenses, as modified by the Court, in case of wrongous suspending. That he should undertake to make good these expenses is a condition of the suspension being allowed to proceed. And unless that means that he shall pay them, if decerned for, so that the respondent in the suspension shall not be a loser by its being allowed to proceed, the language is certainly very badly chosen to express any other idea. If a respondent is to be kept from ¹ Ersk. iii. 3, 72; Simpson v. Fleming, Feb. 3, 1860, 22 D. 679, per Lord Wood at pp. 682-3, 32 Scot. Jur. 256.

No. 197.
 July 15, 1897.
 Stewart v.
 Forbes.

suffering by a wrongous suspension, by caution taken for his protection, I think that can only be done by two things being guarded against by caution, (1) the diminution of that estate on which he has a right to charge, pending the suspension proceedings; and (2) security given to him that he shall be paid the expenses he is put to by the suspension. These are the conditions on which the complainer is allowed to proceed with the suspension. Therefore I am of opinion that whatever may be the liability of the principal here, who was found liable in expenses qua trustee, the cautioner who signed this obligation that payment should be made of the expenses which the Court should modify is bound when called on to make the payment. The respondent in the suspension is not required to discuss the principal first. He is entitled to sue the cautioner, leaving him to find relief, if he can, from his principal. It may be that the cautioner may not be able to obtain full relief against the principal. As to that I express no opinion,—whether the words “as trustee” mean that the suspender is liable, and has relief against the estate, or whether it means that she is only liable to the extent of the estate in her hands for the expenses. Even if it be so, I still would hold that this cautioner, having offered his obligation that the modified expenses would be paid, must be decerned to pay them. The respondent in the suspension is not interested in the question who shall ultimately suffer the loss of these expenses. He holds his obligation binding this defender to pay them, and is entitled to a decree against him in terms of the obligation. In decerning against him, we are only decerning that he shall do that which he undertook to do, and on which undertaking alone the person for whom he intervened was allowed to proceed with the suspension, which has been unsuccessful. I am therefore in favour of affirming the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that this case is ruled by the decision of seven Judges in the case of Craig v. Hogg.¹ In that case it was decided by a majority of five Judges to two that where a judicial factor or trustee is found liable in expenses as judicial factor or trustee, that signifies that he is only liable as judicial factor or trustee to do his duty as such in administering the factorial or trust-estate. That that was decided is, I think, clear from a reference to the opinions of the Judges.

The Judges were all of opinion, and expressed their opinion, that there was no difference between the case of a judicial factor and the case of a trustee.

I stated my opinion very distinctly in that case to the effect that a judicial factor or trustee ought not to be found liable personally in expenses unless there is something in the conduct of the judicial factor or trustee to warrant such a finding—some failure to do his duty as judicial factor or trustee. Some of the Judges expressed an opinion that the general rule was for personal liability. My opinion to the contrary was concurred in by Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear. But all the Judges who were in the majority in that case were of opinion, and expressed themselves clearly to the effect, that whether the general rule is for personal liability or not, the question of liability in that particular case should be determined in favour of the judicial factor, and that when a judicial factor or trustee is found liable "as judicial factor or as trustee" such a finding negated personal liability and inferred liability only as judicial factor or trustee.

¹ Supra, p. 6.

No. 197.

July 15, 1897.
Stewart v.
Forbes.

That case was of importance, not only on the general question of liability in such cases, but also as regards the proper mode of expressing an interlocutor with reference to the question of the personal liability of a judicial factor or trustee for expenses, and it was decided that where the intention is to find a trustee or judicial factor personally liable in expenses, the proper course is to find him in terms personally liable in expenses, and where the intention is to limit his liability to the extent of merely making the factorial or trust-estate forthcoming, the proper course is to find him liable as judicial factor or trustee, and that when he is so found liable, personal liability is negated.

The grounds of my opinion will be found on page 18 of the report, where I am reported to have said,—“I stated in the outset of these observations that the qualifying and limiting words ‘as judicial factor’ in the decree against the complainer are, in my opinion, inconsistent with the personal liability which the respondent contends for, and this opinion, if sound, is enough for the decision of the case.”

Lord Adam concurred in my opinion in terms, and so did Lord Kinnear. Lord McLaren thought that the general rule was for personal liability, but that there was no personal liability where the finding was for liability as judicial factor or trustee. He says,—“The view which I take on the second question would (if I were sitting alone) make it unnecessary to consider the first. I think that the question whether a trustee or judicial factor is to be made liable in expenses individually, or only in his representative capacity, is a question that ought always to be decided in the original action. If the decree is simply against the ‘pursuer’ or the ‘defender,’ I should understand this as meaning that the individual decerned against must pay the expenses, reserving his claim to be indemnified out of the trust-estate, a claim which of course cannot be determined one way or the other in an action to which beneficiaries are not parties. In the present action, the interlocutor in the original action, which is the warrant of the decree, ordains Mr Craig, ‘as judicial factor of Archibald Rodan Hogg,’ to make payment to the pursuer of £159, 6s. 8d. with interest, and also finds the defender, ‘as judicial factor foresaid,’ liable in expenses to the pursuer. It is not disputed that the decerniture for principal and interest due under the account sued for is a decerniture against Mr Craig in his representative capacity; and it follows, in my opinion, that an award of expenses, qualified in identical terms, must be read subject to the same limitation.

“In so reading the decree we are not, as I conceive, laying down new law. So long ago as 1842 the meaning of an obligation undertaken by obligants ‘as trustees’ was determined by the House of Lords. I refer to the case of Gordon v. Campbell.¹”

Lord Moncreiff expressed himself to the same effect. He says,—“I agree with those of your Lordships who hold that it does not” (i.e., that

¹ 1 Bell's App. 428.

No. 197. the decree in that case, according to its terms, did not impose personal liability), because the complainer was found liable in expenses, 'as judicial factor' and not as an individual. These are limiting words; their natural and legal signification and effect is to restrict the decree to one against the party in a representative capacity."

July 15, 1897.
Stewart v.
Forbes.

Therefore I infer that the five Judges who constituted the majority in *Craig v. Hogg*¹ were of opinion that where you have these limiting and qualifying words you have no personal liability.

I must therefore express some surprise at the first sentences of the Lord Ordinary's opinion. He says,—“The interlocutor in the suspension finds Mrs Daily, as trustee of John Cameron Daily, ‘her husband, the original complainer, liable to the respondent in expenses.’ I am inclined to think that the words which I have quoted are only descriptive and explanatory of how Mrs Daily became liable in expenses in a suspension which was brought by her husband, John Cameron Daily. Assuming, however, that the rule laid down in the case of *Craig v. Hogg*¹ applies, and that the words in the interlocutor ‘as trustee,’ limit Mrs Daily's liability to the extent of the trust-estate,” and so on. I cannot think it doubtful that *Craig v. Hogg*¹ applies, and the Lord Ordinary suggests nothing to the contrary which was not overruled in the case of Craig v. Hogg.¹ The decree against Mrs Daily finds her, “as trustee of the said John Cameron Daily, her husband, the original suspender, liable to the respondent in expenses.” That may, no doubt, be a serious liability. She must do her duty in recovering payment of these expenses out of the trust-estate. Now, Mrs Daily has a cautioner, and this action is against him for payment of the expenses so decreed for as her cautioner. The pursuer's first plea in law is as follows:—“The defender Roderick Forbes being bound, in terms of his bond of caution, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum sued for, decree should be pronounced therefor, with expenses.” It is not contended that he is liable except as her cautioner, and in terms of his bond of caution. The question is whether this imposes a liability on him which is not upon his principal and never was. She was not found liable in expenses. She was found liable in expenses “as trustee.” And it is her liability which he as cautioner is bound to discharge. I am bound to say I differ entirely from your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary. There is no liability upon the defender except as cautioner for Mrs Daily. The bond of caution begins as follows:—“I, Roderick Forbes, solicitor, 22 Castle Street, Edinburgh, bind and oblige myself, and my heirs, executors, and successors, as cautioners and surety, acted in the books of Council and Session, for Mrs Janet Cairns Welsh or Daily, residing in Gladstone Place, Leith, widow of John Cameron Daily, sometime of No. 24 Bernard Street, Leith, now deceased, trustee acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of the said John Cameron Daily, that she shall as trustee foresaid pay,” and so on. That is the introduction to the bond of caution, and these are the only words of obligation in the bond. These words are the ordinary words of style. He also binds himself that payment shall be made of whatever sum the said Lords shall modify in name of damages and expenses in case of wrongous suspending, but this expression must be read along with the introductory words, which, as I have said, are the only words of obligation in the bond by No. 197. which the cautioner is only bound as cautioner for Mrs Daily "as trustee."

I know of no case in which a cautioner is liable for more than his principal except upon some special ground. We were referred very properly to state-^{July 15, 1897.}ments from Erskine's Institutes, iii. 3, 64, and Stair's Institutions, i. 17, 10, to the effect that cautioners for minors acting without their curators and married women may be found personally liable although they have no relief against their principals. These are on the statement of them emphatically exceptional cases. The cautioner in such cases is found liable for his gross indiscretion and indeed impropriety of conduct in becoming liable for a minor acting without his curators, or for a married woman. This case is entirely different. ^{Stewart v. Forbes.}

Now, by this decree which your Lordships propose to pronounce we either make Mrs Daily liable by making the cautioner liable with relief against her according to the ordinary rule of law, and so impose upon her a liability which the Lord Ordinary in his original decree declined to impose—when I say declined I am assuming of course that the words "as trustee" have the limiting and qualifying effect which the majority of the Court in the case of *Craig v. Hogg*¹ were of opinion that they had—or we have an example of a case which has never to my knowledge occurred before of a cautioner being found liable for more than his principal without any relief against his principal, and without any fault or indiscretion on his part, as in the case of the cautioner for a minor acting without his curator, or a married woman. I cannot assent to that. I think that the cautioner is liable only in so far as his principal is liable. I think therefore that the cautioner here is bound to implement the decree only in so far as Mrs Daily is bound.

There are some exceptional words introduced into the bond with a view to protecting any preference which the respondents might have already secured. They were introduced for no other purpose. All the rest is in the ordinary words of style.

I am therefore of opinion that the opinion of the Lord Ordinary is wrong, and that his interlocutor ought to be reversed. I regard this case as of importance because it arises on the case of Craig v. Hogg.¹

LORD TRAYNER.—In the interlocutor under review the Lord Ordinary assumes the rule laid down by the majority of the Court in the case of Craig v. Hogg,¹ but thinks it does not form a good defence to the present defender. I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I leave aside the considerations which arise from the difference between a cautioner in a suspension and an ordinary cautioner who intervenes at the request of a creditor to guarantee the debtor's debt. These considerations are by no means immaterial in themselves, but in my view do not need to be taken into account here. I think the cautioner's obligation here is to see paid whatever expenses shall be found due "in case of wrongous suspending." The reasons of suspension were repelled, and therefore there was "wrongous suspending" in the sense of the bond of caution.

I cannot take the view that the cautioner's obligation before us is limited to the extent of the suspender's liability for expenses. His liability for the prin-

No. 197. cipal sum is so limited. He undertakes as cautioner that the suspender shall "as trustee foresaid" make a certain payment which the bond of caution defines. But the bond does not bind the cautioner merely to pay the expenses which the suspender "as trustee foresaid" shall be decreed to pay. He guarantees substantively that "payment shall be made" of the expenses found due in respect of wrongous suspending. He is not asked now to do more.

July 15, 1897.
Stewart v.
Forbes.

To limit the cautioner's obligation as he contends for, would make the caution not a benefit but an injury to the charging creditor. For if the executor makes payment of the expenses out of the estate under her charge (which she must do if she has estate enough to do it) she just diminishes the fund out of which the charging creditor is to operate payment of the principal sum due to him. In a word, it would be giving the charger decree for expenses against his opponent, and allowing the opponent to pay them out of the charger's money.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

WALLACE & PENNELL, S.S.C.—WELSH & FORBES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 198. JOHN LIDDLE CROMBIE (Peter Bell's Executor), First Party.—
Macfarlane—Graham Stewart.
July 15, 1897. DAVID BORTHWICK (Mrs Bell's Executor), Second Party.—
Bell's Macfarlane—Graham Stewart.
Executor v. EUPHEMIA BORTHWICK AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—C. J. Guthrie— Borthwick. Gunn.
DAVID BORTHWICK AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—Macfarlane—
Graham Stewart.

Succession—Substitution in moveables—Evacuation—Fee or Liferent—Repugnancy.—By general disposition and settlement a testator disposed to his wife his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to him at the time of his death, "and in the event of the said" wife "predeceasing me, or should I predecease her and she fail to exercise the power of disposal given her by this deed, then I direct my executor after mentioned to realise the whole of my estate, heritable and moveable, above conveyed," and to pay legacies specified to certain persons named. The testator then nominated an executor. The testator was survived by his wife.

On the testator's death the executor named in the deed took out confirmation and obtained possession of the whole estate left by the husband, which consisted entirely of moveable property. The widow died within six months after her husband's death intestate, and without having done anything towards disposing of the husband's estate, which remained entirely in possession of the executor.

In a competition between the legatees named in the husband's settlement and the wife's next of kin, held (dub. Lord Trayner) that on the death of the testator his wife became absolute owner of his whole estate, and that it passed on her death to her next of kin—diss. Lord Moncreiff, on the ground that, on a sound construction of the husband's settlement, the wife became fief of his estate, with a substitution in favour of the legatees named, which substitution had not been evacuated.

2D DIVISION.

PETER BELL, gardener, North Berwick, died on 2d November 1895, leaving a general disposition and settlement dated 28th February 1873, and three codicils thereto dated respectively 9th February 1882, 11th March 1887, and 24th November 1894.

The general disposition and settlement was in the following terms: No. 198.

—"I, Peter Bell, gardener, residing in North Berwick, for the love and favour which I have and bear to Elizabeth Borthwick or Bell, my wife, and for other good causes and considerations, do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispose to and in favour of the said Elizabeth Borthwick or Bell my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated or addebted, which shall belong or be addebted to me at the time of my death, with the whole vouchers and instructions of the said moveable and personal estate, and particularly, without prejudice, the effects and sums of money which may be contained in any inventory made up and subscribed by me as relative to these presents, and which shall be as sufficient to exclude the necessity of confirmation as if every particular thereof were herein inserted. And in the event of the said Elizabeth Borthwick or Bell predeceasing me, or should I predecease her and she fail to exercise the power of disposal given her by this deed, then I direct my executor after mentioned to realise the whole of my estate, heritable and moveable, above conveyed (power of sale and disposal, either by public roup or private bargain, being hereby given to him), and to pay the following legacies to the persons after named, viz."—(Then followed legacies of various sums of money)—"And I hereby nominate and appoint John Trotter, druggist, East Linton, whom failing by death or declinature to act, John Liddle Crombie, Doctor of Medicine, North Berwick, to be my sole executor. . . .—In witness whereof," &c.

July 15, 1897.
Bell's
Executor v.
Borthwick.

By the codicils the testator revoked certain of the pecuniary legacies and added others, the added legacies being in the form of directions to "my executor above named, in the event of the also herein above designed Elizabeth Borthwick or Bell predeceasing me, or should I predecease her and she fail to exercise the power of disposal given her by the said deed, to pay to," &c.

The testator's widow, Mrs Elizabeth Borthwick or Bell, survived her husband, and died intestate on 22d April 1896.

On her death the question arose whether the legatees of pecuniary legacies under Mr Bell's settlement were entitled to their legacies, and a special case was presented for the determination of this question.

Dr Crombie, Mr Bell's executor-nominate, was the first party; David Borthwick, Mrs Bell's executor-dative, was the second party; Miss Euphemia Borthwick and others, the pecuniary legatees under Mr Bell's settlement, were the third parties; and David Borthwick and others, Mrs Bell's next of kin, were the fourth parties.

The case stated (in addition to the facts already narrated):—"The first party, as executor of the said Peter Bell, duly entered upon the possession and administration of the said executry estate. . . . The said Elizabeth Borthwick or Bell did not execute any deed, or exercise any power of disposal of the estate of the said Peter Bell. At the time of her death the said estate was still in possession of the executor, the first party hereto, and had not been wound up, nor any part thereof paid to her, and no discharge given to said executor."

The total amount of the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by Mr Bell was £645. The case contained no information as to whether the estate left by him exceeded that sum, but counsel for the fourth parties stated at the hearing (in answer to the Court) that they believed that there would be a small excess in the event of a favour-

No. 198. able realisation of the investments. It was admitted by the parties at the hearing that the whole estate left by Mr Borthwick was moveable, but there was no information, either in the case or otherwise, as to the precise character of the investments.

July 15, 1897.
Bell's
Executor v.
Borthwick.

The third parties, as legatees under the settlement of Mr Bell, maintained that as Mrs Bell did not dispose in any way of the testator's estate, which remained in the hands of his executor, they were entitled to their respective legacies out of his estate; or otherwise, that the legacies were burdens upon the succession of Mrs Bell, and payable by her executor.

The fourth parties, as next of kin of Mrs Bell, maintained that by the settlement of Mr Bell the estate thereby conveyed passed to his widow absolutely and without qualification, and being vested in her, now formed part of her estate, which was in intestacy and divisible among her next of kin, free and disencumbered of the legacies.

The following were the question of law:—"1. Are the third parties, being the legatees under the said settlement and codicils of the late Peter Bell, entitled to payment of their respective legacies therein mentioned? 2. If the first question be answered in the affirmative, are said legacies payable out of Peter Bell's or Mrs Bell's estate?"

Argued for the fourth parties;—The third parties put their case alternatively—either on the ground that the pecuniary legacies were burdens on the gift of the whole estate to the widow, or on the ground that the legacies were given in substitution to the gift to the widow, which substitution had not been evacuated by the widow. (1) The first of these grounds was plainly untenable. The settlement began with a direct and absolute gift of the fee of the testator's whole estate, expressed in terms which were free from ambiguity. There was no conveyance in trust for the widow, nor was she trustee for the legatees or anyone else. On the death of the testator she became vested with the right to immediate possession of the estate to dispose of as she pleased. The legacies, if construed as burdens on such an unqualified gift, were clearly repugnant to that gift, and as such were ineffectual.¹ (2) The alternative ground taken by the third parties—that the legacies were given in substitution to the gift to the widow—was also untenable. If the legacies had been in the form of direct gifts to the legatees, conditional on the widow dying without disposing of the estate, the case would perhaps have been more favourable for the third parties; but looking to the scheme of the settlement as it was actually expressed, it was inconsistent with the idea of a substitution, which was not to be presumed in the case of moveables, but must be established in the clearest terms. Under the settlement, if anyone took as substitute, it was the testator's executor, not the legatees, who, if they took under the settlement at all, could do so only through the executor. Now, the notion of the executor taking as substitute under the testament of the deceased was very anomalous, for a substitution implied that the institute was vested in the fee of the subject, and an executor was entitled to recover only what remained part of the estate of the deceased. Again, if the executor was entitled to recover any of the estate undisposed of by No. 198. the widow, he was entitled and bound (looking to the instructions left by the testator) to recover the whole of such estate. If, then, that estate exceeded the total amount of the legacies—and it seemed probable that the total estate left by Mr Bell would on realisation exceed to a small extent the aggregate amount of the legacies—what was the executor to do with the surplus? The widow's representatives plainly had no right to it, nor had the legatees, whose legacies ex hypothesi were fully satisfied. There remained only intestacy. But the Court would be slow to construe a testamentary deed in such a way as to produce partial intestacy. In short, it was impossible to spell an effectual substitution out of the settlement. The case of *Mickel's Judicial Factor*¹ shewed that under a destination like the present the widow became fiar of the whole estate, and that no one representing the husband could recover any part of it. [LORD TRAYNER.—But in Mickel's case the estate had been reduced into possession by the widow.] Mickel's case was at all events an authority on the construction of a settlement like the present. It was true that at the date of the widow's death the estate here was de facto in possession of the executor, and in this circumstance lay the real strength of the case for the third parties. Looking, however, to the terms of the testator's instructions to his executor, it was clear that the executor's duties commenced only on the death of the widow, and in confirming and taking possession of the estate on the death of the testator, the executor had really acted ultra vires. His possession truly was the possession of the widow, to whom he ought to have transferred the estate at the earliest opportunity, and the circumstance that he had not done so would not prejudice her rights, in accordance with the rule quod fieri debet infectum valet. The construction of a testamentary deed ought not to depend on accidental events.² If, then, the estate was regarded as having been in the possession of the widow at the time of her death, the substitution, assuming that there was a substitution, had been evacuated.

¹ Douglas' Trustees v. Kay's Trustees, Dec. 2, 1879, 7 R. 295; Clouston's Trustees v. Bulloch, July 5, 1889, 16 R. 937; Duthie's Trustees v. Forlong, July 17, 1889, 16 R. 1002; Simson's Trustees v. Brown, March 11, 1890, 17 R. 581.

Argued for the third parties;—That the testator intended the legatees named in his settlement to take, in the event of his widow dying without disposing of his estate, was certain. It might be that he had so expressed himself as to make it impossible to give effect to that intention, but the Court would be very slow to allow technicalities or inaccuracy or confusion of expression to defeat an obvious testamentary intention. One view of the case for the third parties was that the legacies were burdens on the gift to the widow,³ but probably the more satisfactory ground was that the legatees took as substitutes.⁴ If the legacies had been in favour of the legatees directly the case would have been a clear case of substitution; the difficulty arose from the blunder of interposing the executor as the person to take in the first instance. But that came to no more than the

¹ Mickel's Judicial Factor v. Oliphant, Dec. 7, 1892, 20 R. 172.

² Buchanan's Trustees v. Dalziel's Trustees, Feb. 28, 1868, 6 Macph. 536, per Lord Deas, p. 540, 40 Scot. Jur. 273.

³ Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees, July 17, 1895, 22 R. 927.

⁴ Buchanan's Trustees v. Dalziel's Trustees, Feb. 28, 1868, 6 Macph. 536, 40 Scot. Jur. 273; Pursell v. Elder, June 13, 1865, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 59, 37 Scot. Jur. 394, 4 Macq. 992; Massy v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 5, 1872, 11 Macph. 173, 45 Scot. Jur. 127; M'Clymont's Executor v. Osborne, Feb. 16, 1895, 22 R. 411.

July 15, 1897.
Bell's
Executor v.
Borthwick.

No. 198. appointment of a person to see to the interest of the legatees; there was nothing illegal in making such an appointment, and it was natural that the person named as executor should fulfil this additional duty. The broad fact remained that the beneficial substitutes were the legatees. If, then, the case was one of substitution, had the substitution been evacuated? The widow had not left any deed of evacuation, nor had she disposed of the estate, but it was said that the estate having come into her possession the substitution had thereby been evacuated. Now, the fourth parties did not suggest that the widow had ever had actual possession of the estate. What they maintained was that she had had constructive possession through the executor, whose possession was, they maintained, her possession. Assuming, but without admitting, that that was so, it was not sufficient to establish the case for the fourth parties. What they had to shew was that the estate of the husband had been, before the death of the widow, immixed with her estate, so that the husband's estate no longer existed as a separate subject, capable of identification as the subject of the substitution. In that view it was immaterial what the purpose was for which the executor held the estate, or what his title to possess might be; his possession as a fact was sufficient to identify the husband's estate, and so to exclude evacuation. Even if the widow had herself obtained actual possession, that would have been immaterial, provided that the husband's estate was, at her death, capable of being identified.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—Peter Bell, by his will and codicils, directed his executor, in a specified event, to realise his whole estate, heritable and moveable, which he had conveyed to his wife, and to pay certain legacies.

The questions submitted to us are, 1st, Whether, in the circumstances stated in the case, these legacies are payable, and if so, 2d, Whether they are payable out of the estate of the testator or that of his widow.

The circumstances are these: Mr Bell's will consists of a conditional direction to his executor, which follows an absolute gift and disposition to his wife of his whole estate, heritable and moveable. In the first and leading part of the deed the testator does not express his will or intention, leaving it to be executed by an executor or trustee, but, as Lord Lyndhurst, I think, quaintly expresses it, is "his own conveyance," that is to say, he himself directly makes the gift and conveyance. The condition of the will, or direction to his executor, which follows, is the event of his donee predeceasing him, or failing "to exercise the power of disposal given her by this deed." There is no "power of disposal" given by the deed, and the power meant is no doubt just the power of disposal possessed by every absolute owner.

Bell, the disponent and testator, died in November 1895, and his widow the donee, died in April 1896, intestate. It is not stated what the estate of Bell at his death consisted of, but it is stated that at the widow's death his estate, whatever it consisted of, "was still in possession of the executor, the first party hereto, and had not been wound up, nor any part thereof paid to her."

On these facts it seems clear that the event (or one of the events) occurred on which the testator directed his executor to realise and sell the whole estate, heritable and moveable, which he had gifted and conveyed to his wife, and pay certain legacies with the proceeds. She survived him, but died without having disposed of the property, and the only question is whether or not the direction is valid and operative by the law of Scotland. I am of opinion that it is not.

No. 198.
July 15, 1897.
Bell's
Executor v.
Borthwick.

I think it is clear that on Mr Bell's death the conveyance to Mrs Bell took effect, and that she was thereafter absolute owner of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, which it comprehends. She was certainly not a trustee, and there is no conveyance to another of anything, heritable or moveable, in trust or otherwise.

The expression of will which follows the conveyance consists, as I have pointed out, of a direction to an executor-nominate, and is expressly conditioned on one or other of two events, viz., that the donee of his whole estate either predeceased him, or surviving him eventually died without having disposed of that estate. The second event—that which happened—has alone to be considered. I have already noticed that “the power of disposal” referred to must of necessity be that which accompanies ownership under an absolute conveyance, for there was no other. Now, the estate which the executor is directed to realise and sell is “the whole of my estate, heritable and moveable, above conveyed” (not to his executor or any other in trust, but to his wife beneficially), and that only in the event of the donee having become the owner of it by the disposition, and continued so for any length of time, but dying at last without having exercised her power of ownership by disposing of it. It seems clear therefore that if the donee survived the disponent, the executor was not directed or authorised to realise or interfere with the estate, or any part of it, so long as the donee lived. The universal donee required no aid from the executor-nominate to recover the estate, and I am satisfied that it was not contemplated that the executor should be required, or I think entitled, to interfere in any way while she lived. Mr Bell seems to have thought of saving to his widow even the delay and cost of confirmation by having an inventory made of his estate given to her by the disposition. But whether or not the assistance of the executor-nominate was thought useful, or even necessary, and whether it was taken or not, cannot, I think, affect the quality of the widow's right by the conveyance. From the moment of her husband's death, the whole estate he died possessed of was hers, and subject to her debts and deeds, exactly as it had been his and subject to his debts and deeds. Nor was her estate a “trust-estate,” meaning thereby a beneficial interest in property held in trust, i.e., standing on a trust title, which is the proper meaning of the term. There was here no trust in anyone—certainly not during the widow's survivance—unless, indeed, it should be held that the direction to the executor in the event of her death without disposing of the property (necessarily assumed to be hers and so at her disposal) to realise and sell the whole of it, whether heritable or moveable, constituted him a trustee from the first. It was stated, I think, that Mr Bell died landless, but had he at his death owned land of any extent or value, it would certainly have been carried by the conveyance to his wife, and if the direction to the executor which I am dealing with was valid and operative, and made him trustee, it would have applied to land as well as money

No. 198. and goods, and whether these were inventoried to avoid confirmation or not.

July 15, 1897.
Bell's
Executor v.
Borthwick.

Assuming that Mr Bell's executor-nominate duly and properly, with the assent, and probably at the request, of the widow, entered upon the possession and administration of his executry estate, the question is for whom did he hold it, and to whom was he bound to account for it. I have in what I have already said expressed my opinion on that question. While the widow lived he could not have refused her demand to account for and pay to her everything he had realised, and she having died either without demanding her own, or without having her demand satisfied, it follows, I think, very clearly, that the familiar rule of law which puts her executor in her place applies and must have effect. Her executor must realise her estate, pay her debts, her deathbed and funeral expenses, and account to her legal representative for the balance, if any, that remains. If we could hold that the third parties, as legatees of Mr Bell, have a claim not on his estate but on that of his widow, we may of course order her executor, who is a party to the case, to satisfy their claim. But I will not waste time by dwelling on this view, which is presented by the second question.

I have, I hope and think, said enough to shew why I must reject the argument for the third parties to the effect that there is here what was represented to be a substitution to the widow in the property heritable and moveable conveyed to her, or a simple destination which she might have defeated had she pleased, but which, as she did nothing to alter it, must have effect to the exclusion of her legal heirs.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have found this case attended with a good deal of difficulty. I am unable to divest myself of the impression that the testator's intention was that the legacies now claimed by the third parties should be paid to them if his wife during her survivance did not use or otherwise dispose of his estate. That he gave his wife, in the event of her survivance a right to the whole of his estate is clear. But what is not so clear is whether the testator's gift to his wife was not conditional, to this extent at least, that whatever part of the estate she did not dispose of (either by use, gifts to others, mortis causa settlement or otherwise) should go according to the directions in his own settlement. In construing a testamentary writing the first consideration is the intention of the testator, if that intention can be ascertained from the writing under construction; and if so ascertained it should receive effect. Following that rule, with the impression I have formed as to what the testator intended, I would not be indisposed to sustain the contention for the third parties. But on the other hand, it may be that the intention of the testator as indicated by his will, or fairly inferrible from its terms, has not been given effect to by him in the deed he has executed, in which case the terms of the deed must be followed, and the inference as to intention disregarded. It is certainly maintainable that that is what has happened here. The conveyance to Mrs Bell of the whole estate is absolute, and vested in her by survivance. The legacies are bequeathed only in the event of Mrs Bell not exercising the "right of disposal given to her by this deed." But there was more than a right of disposal conferred on her, there was a right of absolute property, and if this had been clearly recognised by the testator the deed might have been otherwise expressed, but how that would or might have altered the terms of the deed we cannot conjecture. Further, it is plain that the testator intended to dispose of his whole estate by the provisions expressed in his deed, for there is no clause disposing of residue, and I cannot suppose that he intended his estate (after payment of the legacies) to be disposed of as intestate succession, which it must be if the legacies do not amount to the sum of the whole estate.

On the whole I do not dissent from the course which your Lordships propose to follow, although I adopt that course not without considerable hesitation.

LORD MONCREIFF.—Substitution in moveables is recognised in the law of Scotland. It is not a favourite and it is not readily presumed, and the substitution if effectually created will be evacuated either by any clearly expressed intention of the institute to evacuate it, as by assigning or spending the money, or by its becoming immixed with his own funds, or by his disposing of it by will. But if not evacuated, a substitution must receive effect.

The first question in this case is whether substitution is intended. The deed is in some respects a bungled deed, but the testator's intention, expressed no less than four times, I think is clear, though the machinery would, in circumstances which have not occurred (that is, in the event of the funds having been paid over to Mrs Bell), have been inappropriate and unworkable. The widow is to have an absolute right to the whole estate, in this sense, that she may dispose of it gratuitously or onerously during her life or by will. She is not a mere liferenter, as Lord Stair says (iii., 5, 51),—"The nature and intent of such clauses is not to constitute the first person as a naked liferenter, but that they are understood as if they were thus expressed: 'With power to the first person to alter and dispose at pleasure during his life.'"

But if she does not do so, and the funds are extant at the date of her death, so much of them as is required shall be taken to satisfy the legacies mentioned in Peter Bell's settlements and codicils. The will provides no trust or other machinery to protect the interests of the substitutes, but this does not prevent an effectual substitution. If indeed the funds had once passed into the possession of Mrs Bell there might have been grounds for maintaining, though this is by no means clear on the authorities, that the substitution was ipso facto evacuated.—Buchanan's Trustees v. Dalziel's Trustees.¹ But in the present case the funds were not paid over to Mrs Bell. She survived her husband, and therefore right to the money was fully vested in her. But she died within six months of her husband, and therefore before the executor was legally bound to make payment to her. She died intestate without having assigned her rights, and apparently no creditors are claiming as in her right. The funds are still in the hands of Mr Bell's executor. Therefore there is no practical difficulty in the way of giving effect to the truster's intention.

No. 198.
July 15, 1897.
Bell's
Executor v.
Borthwick.

¹ 6 Macph. 536, per Lord Deas, p. 540.

No. 198. I know of no case in which a substitution being well created, and the funds not having been paid over to the institute, the substitution has not received effect on the institute dying without evacuating the substitution.
 July 15, 1897. Bell's
 Executor v. Borthwick.
 On these grounds I am of opinion that the third parties are entitled to payment of their respective legacies out of the moveable (the only) estate in the executor's hands.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I admit that my opinion has wavered, but ultimately I have reached the conclusion at which Lord Young has arrived.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and found it unnecessary to answer the second question.

JOHN MACKAY, S.S.C.—JOHN DOBIE, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 199. JOHN SCOTT TAIT (Buttercase & Geddie's Trustee), Pursuer and Nominal Raiser (Reclaiming).—Johnston—Cook.
 July 16, 1897. Buttercase & Geddie's Trustee v. Geddie.
JAMES GEDDIE, Real Raiser and Defender (Respondent).—D. Dundas—W. Campbell.

Lease—Irritancy—Exercise of option to declare lease ipso facto null and void in event of tenant executing trust-deed—Damages for breach of contract.
 —The lease of a farm in favour of A and B jointly and their respective heirs, excluding subtenants and assignees, contained a clause declaring that if the estates of the tenants, or either of them, were sequestrated, or conveyed in trust for behoof of their creditors, the lease should, in the option of the landlord, be ipso facto null and void.

Before the end of the lease the estates of A were sequestrated. B continued solvent and offered to go on with the lease. The landlord declined to agree to this, and claimed damages for loss through diminution of rent in consequence of the premature termination of the lease.

In a question as to the validity of the landlord's claim, held (1) (following Young v. Gerard, 6 D. 347) that, assuming A to have abandoned the lease, such abandonment did not terminate B's tenancy; (2) that the lease must be held to have been terminated by the landlord in the exercise of his option, and therefore (in accordance with Walker's Trustees v. Manson, 13 R. 1198, and Bidoulac v. Sinclair's Trustee, 17 R. 144) that the landlord was not entitled to damages for breach of contract.

Bankruptcy—Voluntary Trust-deed—Liability of trustee for payment of invalid claim.—Held that a trustee for behoof of creditors who had in good faith, but against the protest of the truster, and so precipitately that the latter had no opportunity of interdicting him, paid a claim which was afterwards held to be invalid, was liable to make good the sum so paid away by him.

Expenses—Personal liability of trustee for behoof of creditors—Payment of invalid claim.—In an action of multiplepoinding raised in name of a trustee, a claimant objected to the condescendence of the fund in medio, in so far as the trustee took credit for a payment he had made to C, on the ground that C had no valid claim. The trustee maintained that C had a valid claim. The Court sustained the objection. Held that the trustee was personally liable in expenses to the objector, and that he was not entitled to charge his own expenses against the objector's share of the fund in medio, reserving to the pursuer all right of relief competent to him against other persons.

1ST DIVISION. IN 1893 Mr Charles B. Balfour, of Newton Don, let to Thomas LdStormonth-Darling. Buttercase and James Geddie, "jointly, and their respective heirs," but expressly excluding subtenants and assignees, the farm of Lochty for a period of thirty years, from Whitsunday 1893, at a yearly rent of £108. No. 199.

The lease, inter alia, provided "that if at any time during the currency hereof the tenants or either of them shall have become notour bankrupt, or should their estate and effects, or any portions thereof, have become sequestrated or conveyed in trust for behoof of their creditors or attached by their legal diligence, then this lease shall, in the option of the landlord, become ipso facto null and void, and the landlord shall be entitled to apply to the Sheriff of the county, or any competent authority, for a warrant of summary ejection. . . ."

July 16, 1897.
Buttercase &
Geddie's
Trustees v.
Geddie.

On 1st April 1895 Buttercase and Geddie, who, as a firm, carried on business as maltsters on an adjoining feu, executed a trust-deed as a firm and as individuals in favour of John Scott Tait, C.A., Edinburgh, as trustee for behoof of their creditors.

By the trust-deed the trustee was empowered, inter alia, "either to compound, transact, and agree, or to submit and refer any questions or differences that might arise between him and any other person or persons touching the execution of the said trust-deed, whether with relation to the debts due by the said Thomas Buttercase and James Geddie, as sole partners foresaids, or as individuals, or any other matter, or in relation to the premises in any manner of way."

Mr Tait accepted office under the trust-deed, and administered and realised the estates. He intimated to Mr Balfour that he did not intend to take up the lease of Lochty Farm.

On 2d July 1895 Messrs Strathern & Blair, W.S., agents for Mr Balfour, lodged a claim with Mr Tait against Buttercase & Geddie. The claim amounted to £1061, 15s., and represented the capitalised sum of the difference between the rent payable under the lease to Buttercase & Geddie and the rent at which it was estimated the farm would let at the date when the claim was lodged.

On 5th July 1895 the estates of Mr Buttercase were sequestrated, and Mr Tait was appointed trustee thereon. Mr Geddie continued solvent.

Before dealing with the landlord's claim, and after paying the whole other claims which had been admitted, Mr Tait had in his hands, as trustee under the trust-deed, a reversion of about £800.

On 22d August 1895 Mr Tait issued a deliverance sustaining the landlord's claim to the extent of £384, 15s. 5d., as the value of the landlord's claim at the date of the trust-deed, and on 23d August he paid that sum to the landlord's agents.

On 3d September Mr Geddie raised an action of multiplepounding in the name of Mr Tait, as pursuer and nominal raiser, the fund in medio being the balance of the realised assets of Buttercase & Geddie.

Mr Tait having lodged a condescendence of the fund in medio, in which, inter alia, he took credit for the sum of £384, 15s. 5d., which he had paid in settlement of the landlord's claim, Mr Geddie lodged, inter alia (objection 1), an objection to the condescendence, in so far as Mr Tait took credit for this sum.

Mr Geddie pleaded;—1. The trustee is not entitled to credit for the said payment of £384, 15s. 5d., in respect that (1) the claim at the instance of the landlord was wholly unfounded, the objector being able and willing to perform the tenant's part of the contract of lease; . . . and (3) the said payment was wrongfully made by the trustee, in breach of his duty as trustee.

Mr Tait lodged answers to these objections, and pleaded;—1. The objections are irrelevant. 2. The objection to the payment of the sum

No. 199. of £384, 15s. 5d. to Mr Balfour should be repelled, in respect that (1) the claim at Mr Balfour's instance was well founded to the extent to which it was sustained by the trustee; and (2) the said claim was paid by the trustee in bona fide on the advice of counsel, and in exercise of the power conferred upon the trustee by the trust-deed to compound, transact, and agree or submit and refer questions or differences.

July 16, 1897.
Buttercase &
Geddie's
Trustee v.
Geddie.

A proof was allowed before answer.

It appeared from the proof that before the landlord's claim for damages was formally lodged with the trustee the opinion of counsel had been taken by the landlord and the trustee as to its validity, and that counsel had advised that if it could be proved that the lease was held for the firm, the trustee was bound to rank the landlord for the damages caused by the failure of the firm to carry on the lease.*

Before the landlord intimated a claim for damages, Mr Geddie was willing to give up the lease, and when it was first advanced he wrote a letter direct to the landlord begging him not to press it. But when his appeal was refused he consistently maintained the position that he was ready and willing to carry on the lease. The position into which the lease had been brought by the execution of the trust-deed was subject of much negotiation between the landlord's agents, Messrs Strathern & Blair, Mr Tait, the trustee, and Mr Thomas White, Mr Geddie's agent. The landlord's agents declined to accept Mr Geddie as tenant.

On 10th August Mr White wrote to Mr Tait, objecting to the landlord's claim being paid unless it were established in a Court of law, and proposed an action of multiplepoining.

On 21st August Mr White had a meeting with Mr Tait, at which Mr White again suggested an action of multiplepoining. Mr Tait said, "Why do you not interpel me from dealing with the landlord's claim?" At this meeting a letter to Messrs Strathern & Blair was adjusted in the following terms:—"Edinburgh, 21st August 1895.—Dear Sirs,—As agent of Mr Geddie, I hereby intimate that he is prepared to adopt the lease of the Lochty Farm, granted by Mr Charles B. Balfour, of Balgonie, in favour of Mr Buttercase and him as individuals, and I shall be obliged by your letting me know, before Friday at noon, whether your client is prepared to accept Mr Geddie's obligation in full of the whole obligations in the lease. . . ." The letter was signed by Mr White, and sent to Messrs Strathern & Blair on the same day by Mr White, who intimated to Mr Tait that he had sent it.

No answer was sent to Mr White, but Mr Murray, clerk to Messrs Strathern & Blair, called the following day and told Mr Tait that they had no intention of replying to it. Thereupon the trustee prepared his deliverance, admitting the landlord's claim to the extent of £384, 15s. 5d. The deliverance was accepted by the landlord's agents on the 23d August, and on the same day the trustee gave them a cheque for the sum admitted.

On 16th February 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains objection 1; repels objection 2; finds the pursuer and nominal raiser liable to the objector James Geddie in the expenses connected with the said objections to

* Counsel added,—"I have not had submitted to me any statement of the actings of the landlord and the trustee with respect to the lease, but I assume that the landlord did not exercise the power of annulling the lease given by the contract in the event of the execution of a trust-deed by the tenant, and that the landlord therefore stands very much in the position of the landlord in Bidoulac's case, 17 R. 144."

the condescendence of the fund to the extent of five-sixths of the No. 199.
taxed amount thereof. . . .”*

Mr Tait reclaimed.

The arguments of the parties sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.¹

July 16, 1897.
Buttercase &
Geddie's
Trustees v.
Geddie.

* “OPINION.— . . . My opinion is that the claim of damages was bad in law. Such a claim can only be made in respect of abandonment of the lease by the tenant. If a landlord either exercises his option to bring the lease to an end, or accepts a renunciation by the tenant without reserving his right to damages, his claim is barred (Walker's Trustees v. Manson, 13 R. 1198). The claim only holds where the abandonment is the voluntary act of the tenant, as in Bidoulac v. Sinclair's Trustees, 17 R. 144.

“Now, where was the abandonment in this case? The mere execution of the trust-deed in April 1895 did not constitute abandonment. The lease was not thereby assigned, because it was not assignable without the landlord's consent, and the landlord never consented. Neither did the sequestration of Buttercase constitute abandonment, for according to the well-known dictum of Mr Bell (Com. 1, 76), ‘Bankruptcy does not of itself annul a lease. The tenant, though bankrupt, may still continue in the possession, provided he pay the rent regularly and perform the other stipulations of the contract. All that the landlord is entitled to do, in case of his tenant's failure to pay the rent, is to have recourse to the hypothec and the proceedings prescribed in the Act of Sederunt, 1756.’ If, therefore, both Buttercase and Geddie had desired to carry on the farm, the landlord could not have prevented them except by exercising his option under the lease. But even if the action of the trustee is to be taken as a practical abandonment on the part of Buttercase, it does not follow that Geddie, the solvent joint tenant, was thereby ousted from possession. That is, so far as I can judge, precisely the point that was decided in the case of Young v. Gerard, 6 D. 347. The lease there was in favour of two joint tenants and their respective heirs and successors, with an exclusion of assignees and sub-tenants, and an option to the landlord to bring the lease to an end in case of bankruptcy, just as here. One of the tenants died; the other became bankrupt and executed a renunciation of the lease. The representatives of the deceased tenant claimed to remain in possession of the subjects, and the landlord attempted to remove them, pleading, inter alia, that the lease being a joint lease in which he was entitled to have two solvent tenants, it came to an end by the bankruptcy of either tenant. But the Inner-House, affirming Lord Wood, rejected that plea, and held that the right of the solvent tenant was not irritated by the bankruptcy and renunciation of the other.

“There is one other argument which I ought to notice. It was said that the lease, though taken in favour of two persons jointly without mention of any partnership, was truly a partnership asset. . . . But I am at a loss to see how that could enlarge or affect the rights of the landlord. His rights were defined by the written contract. If the lease had been taken to the firm, or to the partners as trustees for the firm, the dissolution of the firm by the bankruptcy of one of the partners would have brought the lease to an end without any action on the part of the landlord, though it by no means follows that in such a case the landlord would be entitled to claim damages for abandonment. But that is on the principle that when the firm is dissolved there is no longer a tenant. When the tenants are individuals they remain tenants notwithstanding the dissolution of the firm. . . .

“I look in vain for any evidence of abandonment by Geddie, who must, I think, be held to have been turned out by the landlord. If so, no damages were due, and objection 1 must be sustained. . . .”

¹ The following authorities were referred to:—Young v. Gerard, Dec. 23,

No. 199. At advising,—

July 16, 1897. LORD KINNEAR.—The Lord Ordinary has sustained the first objection of Buttercase & Geddie's Trustees v. Geddie.

LORD KINNEAR.—The Lord Ordinary has sustained the first objection of Mr Geddie to the fund in medio, and the facts upon which that objection arises are very simple. [His Lordship here stated the facts, and proceeded]—It is in these circumstances that the objection is stated to Mr Tait taking credit for the sum paid by him to Mr Balfour in respect of future rents. The arrears of bygone rent were paid in full, and that was perfectly right. The only question is, whether the trustee is entitled to credit for the sum paid for future claims.

That raises two questions, first, whether Mr Balfour had a good claim for the sum in question; and, secondly, whether, if he had not, Mr Tait is liable to make good the amount.

In considering the first question, I do not think it necessary to inquire whether the lease was or was not an asset of the firm. As between landlord and tenant, it was a lease in favour of two joint tenants and their respective heirs and successors, and not of a firm, or the trustees of a firm. That is the position with which we start.

Nor do I think it necessary to inquire whether the lease was renounced by Mr Buttercase, or by anybody on his behalf, in such circumstances as would have given the landlord a claim of damages against him if he had been sole tenant. I think it follows from the decision in *Young*¹ that the renunciation of Buttercase or his abandonment of the lease could not determine the right of his co-tenant, Geddie; and if Geddie was still entitled to possession of the farm, and was ready to perform the tenant's part of the contract of lease, the renunciation of Buttercase, assuming it to have been finally and completely made, could found no claim of damages against Geddie, and no claim which could prejudice his interest in the surplus of the trust-estate.

On the other hand, if Geddie himself had failed or refused to perform his contract, it may be assumed that the renunciation of both tenants would afford a sufficient ground for the landlord's claim of damages. The question therefore is, whether it was the act of the landlord or of Geddie which put an end to the lease. It is to be kept in view that the lease contained a clause providing that if the tenants, or either of them, should become notour bankrupt, or if their estates should be sequestrated or conveyed in trust for behoof of their creditors, the lease should, in the option of the landlord, be ipso facto null and void. Now, the event occurred upon which the landlord was entitled to irritate the lease, and therefore it could only be carried on as a lease between him and Geddie if Geddie was prepared to perform his part of the contract, and if the landlord chose to waive his right to put the lease to an end.

There was a great deal of negotiation between the agents of the various parties and a great deal of discussion as to the position into which the lease had been brought in consequence of the trust-deed; and the result of the whole matter was that though Mr Geddie was at one time desirous of renouncing the lease, and actually proposed to do so, the landlord did not accept that proposal, and long before the termination of the negotiations Mr Geddie, or his agent on his behalf, had assumed the perfectly distinct position that he was not going to renounce, but, on the contrary, was going to carry on the lease. Mr Strathern, on the other hand, made it clear enough that he had considered the question whether Mr Geddie would be a desirable tenant for the farm or not, and that he was not prepared to advise his client to accept Mr Geddie as sole tenant.

1843, 6 D. 347, 16 Scot. Jur. 184; Walker's Trustees v. Manson, July 17, 1886, 13 R. 1198; Bidoulac v. Sinclair's Trustee, Nov. 29, 1889, 17 R. 144; Mackenzie's Trustees v. Sutherland, Jan. 10, 1895, 22 R. 223, at p. 236; Forshaw v. Higginson, 8 M. and G. 827.

¹ 6 D. 347.

No. 199.
July 16, 1897.
Buttercase &
Geddie's
Trustee v.
Geddie.

Now, it must be borne in mind that the landlord was in a position to say, "I will bring the lease to an end." He refused his consent, without which Geddie could not have gone on, and therefore it appears to me quite clear that he exercised his right to determine the lease. If the question had been open, I should have been disposed to think that a landlord cannot reject in so peremptory a way the application of a tenant to continue in the lease, and at the same time bring an action of damages against his tenant for refusing to perform the obligations of the lease. But the law is quite clearly settled by the case of Walker's Trustees,¹ which is confirmed by the manner in which the question was treated in the subsequent case of Sinclair's Trustee.² I take it therefore to be settled law that if the landlord himself puts an end to a lease by exercising a right reserved in the contract, he cannot claim damages for the loss he has sustained by its premature termination, because he is not entitled to damages for loss resulting from his own act and not from the failure of the tenant.

If that be so, the trustee here has paid money belonging to the trusters to a person who had no claim to it whatever, and the second question arises, whether in accounting with his trusters he is entitled to take credit for the money so paid. I think he is not, and I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the claim cannot be stated as a good claim so as to reduce Mr Geddie's share of the surplus of the trust-estate. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is no room for questioning the good faith and honesty of the trustee, and the Court must always be alive to the hardship of enforcing against an honest trustee a claim which must result in his becoming personally liable to make good money which he has paid away in good faith. But then his trust was to pay to the true creditors of Buttercase & Geddie and no others, and if he has paid the trusters' money to a person not entitled to receive it, it is no answer to say that he was under an error in law; and that appears to me to be the only answer that can be made with any plausibility. It is true that the trust gave him power to compromise and to transact claims, and it was argued that he was protected by that provision. But it seems to me quite plain that there was no element of transaction or compromise about this matter at all. No doubt the trustee reduced the amount of the claim very considerably. But that was not by way of compromise or transaction, and if the landlord had not been content to accept Mr Tait's deliverance upon that subject there was nothing—no transaction—to prevent him from enforcing his demand to the fullest extent. It was simply a reduction of Mr Balfour's estimate of damages. The whole contention that the deliverance of the trustee was a compromise, and is there-

¹ 13 R. 1198.

² 17 R. 144.

No. 199. fore defensible, is I think made an end of by his own evidence. "I admitted the claim," he says, "and proceeded to adjust it."

July 16, 1897. Is the trustee then entitled to take credit for the payment on any other ground? I think there might be circumstances in which a trustee might well be in a position to claim as against persons interested in the trust that payment of a claim in error was justifiable on the ground either of some concession made by them or of some failure or neglect on their part to bring before him the true nature of the objection to the claim erroneously paid. But it is quite out of the question to suggest that we have such a state of matters here. The trustee knew perfectly well that Mr Geddie and his agent objected to the validity of the landlord's claim, and they not only objected, but they pressed upon him that it should be tried judicially. Mr Tait did not think the process suggested an expedient or desirable kind of action to bring, but that is of very little consequence. The material point is that Mr Geddie desired that the validity of the landlord's claim should be determined in a Court of law. I think, therefore, that in view of his knowledge of that fact, Mr Tait's action was precipitate. He received Mr White's letter on the 21st. On the 22d he was informed by Mr Balfour's agent that Mr Balfour would not accept Mr Geddie. On the same day he proceeded to decide the matter by sustaining Mr Balfour's claim, and on the 23d he gave effect to his decision by paying the money. Unless, therefore, he can shew that the landlord's claim was good in law he is not entitled to take credit for that payment. In the ordinary course of business, I should have thought the proper thing to do was to intimate to Mr Geddie's agent that he had sustained the claim to a certain extent, and that within a certain time he proposed to make payment unless interpellated. Instead of doing that he decides on the 22d, and pays the money on the 23d, without giving time to Mr Geddie to interpose. I think that by so doing he took upon himself the risk of being unable to establish the validity of the claim. I fail to see that there is any very great hardship inflicted upon a trustee by requiring that if he pays away the trust money in such circumstances as to make it impossible that the objections of the parties interested, whom he knows to object, should be determined, he must be held to have taken the responsibility of a final decision upon himself, and must stand or fall according as he can justify that decision or not.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in attaching no weight to the evidence as to a supposed agreement between Mr Tait and the objector not to issue any deliverance, and generally, I am of opinion, upon the ground I have stated, that his Lordship has disposed rightly of this objection.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that we should adhere to his Lordship's interlocutor.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD ADAM concurred.

On the matter of expenses counsel for Mr Geddie moved that the trustee should be found personally liable in expenses.

The trustee argued that he was entitled to expenses, and that in any view there was no ground for holding him personally liable. The validity of the landlord's claim being disputed by Mr Geddie, the trustee was entitled to have a judicial decision on it, and it was of no consequence that the action in which the question was decided was No. 199. between the trustee and Mr Geddie.

July 16, 1897.
Buttercase &
Geddie's
Trustee v.
Geddie.

LORD KINNEAR.—It is perfectly true that by the course proceedings have taken Mr Tait if found liable in expenses in the terms proposed by Mr Campbell will have an expense thrown on him which in ordinary circumstances he would not have been called upon to bear, because he would not have been required to pay the expenses of the litigation required to determine the question between the landlord and tenant. But that unfortunately is due to his own precipitate action. If he was only a stakeholder, and if before paying the money he had taken care to see that the rights of parties were judicially determined, he would not have incurred any expense, because the landlord must either have given up his claim, or paid his opponent's costs if he litigated unsuccessfully. But then it is just part of the error which we have found in the course of procedure that the trustee is forced to take up Mr Balfour's claim, and he cannot maintain it except under the ordinary condition of paying expenses if he fails.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT adhered, "with this variation, that they find the pursuer and nominal raiser personally liable to the objector James Geddie in the expenses found due to the said objector by the said interlocutor: Find the pursuer and nominal raiser personally liable to the said objector in expenses since the date of the said interlocutor . . . Find that the pursuer and nominal raiser is not entitled to charge his own expenses against the objector's share of the fund in medio, reserving to the pursuer and nominal raiser all right of relief competent to him with reference to the said expenses, and the expenses hereinbefore decerned for other than against the objector and his share of the fund in medio."

GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—THOMAS WHITE, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN NEILSON AND OTHERS (Walter Montgomerie Neilson's Trustees), No. 200.

First Parties.—Jameson—Younger.

MRS MARION NEILSON OR HENDERSON AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.

—Johnston—C. K. Mackenzie.

July 17, 1897.
Neilson's
Trustees v.
Henderson.

JOHN NEILSON AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Henderson's Marriage-Contract Trustees), Third Parties.—W. C. Smith—Ramsay.

Marriage-Contract—Conveyance of whole means and estate—Life Interest.
—H., who was entitled under her father's settlement to a liferent which had vested in her, conveyed to trustees, by antenuptial marriage-contract, "All and Sundry the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated, now belonging to her, or to which she may succeed or acquire right" during her marriage, excepting therefrom certain specified sums which did not include the liferent.

The trust purposes included payment to H. of the free yearly income of the estate thus conveyed, and to her husband in the event of his surviving her.

In a question with her marriage-contract trustees, held that H.'s liferent did not fall within the conveyance of her whole means and estate in her

No. 200. marriage-contract, and therefore that she was entitled to direct payment thereof from her father's testamentary trustees.

July 17, 1897. Neilson's Trustees v. Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd, July 13, 1877, 4 R. 1082, and Young's Trustees, May 22, 1885, 12 R. 968, followed.

1st Division. WALTER MONTGOMERIE NEILSON died in 1889, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he directed his trustees to convey the residue of his estate to the extent of two-thirds to his son, and to hold and pay and apply the remaining third for behoof of his daughter in liferent, and any children to be born of her in fee.

By the trust-disposition and settlement it was declared that "all liferents hereby conferred shall be purely alimentary, and shall not be assignable by the liferenter."

In 1896, Marion Neilson, the testator's only daughter, executed an antenuptial marriage-contract whereby she conveyed to trustees for certain purposes,—“All and Sundry the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated, now belonging to her, or to which she may succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, but excepting from this conveyance first the sum of £1000 of her share of the estate held by the trustees under the contract of marriage between her parents after mentioned; and, secondly, all legacies, bequests, and acquisitions of specific articles, or sums of money or securities not exceeding in value on any one occasion £500, that may hereafter be left or given to or acquired by her, and all jewels, personal ornaments, and effects, furniture, pictures, and household effects, all which shall belong to her separately, exclusive of her husband.”

Among these purposes were the following:—(Second) payment to Marion Neilson during her lifetime, for her inalienable alimentary use only, of the free yearly income or revenue of the trust-estate; and (third) payment to her husband, Wilfrid Henderson, in the event of his surviving her, for his inalienable alimentary use only, of the free yearly income.

Power was given to the trustees to adjust accounts, and to receive and discharge “any balance of past income or accumulations of income to which” Marion Neilson, “was entitled under her father's trust-disposition and settlement.”

Mrs Henderson's share of accumulations of income of her father's residue amounted to about £15,000.

A question having arisen with regard to the effect of the marriage-contract conveyance on Mrs Henderson's rights under her father's settlement, this special case was presented by Mr Neilson's testamentary trustees, first parties, Mrs Henderson and her husband, second parties, and Mr and Mrs Henderson's marriage-contract trustees, third parties.

The second parties maintained that Mrs Henderson's liferent under her father's settlement was payable to herself, and not to her marriage-contract trustees.

The third parties maintained that they, as in Mrs Henderson's right under her marriage-contract, were entitled to payment of the liferent for marriage-contract purposes.

The following question, inter alia, was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—“(2) If the said liferent has vested in Mrs Henderson, is the said liferent payable to her or to her marriage-contract trustees?”

Argued for the second parties;—The liferent provided to Mrs

Henderson under her father's settlement had not been conveyed by her marriage-contract; for, in the first place, the testator had declared that none of the liferents conferred by him should be assignable; and, in the second place, apart from that explicit declaration, there was a legal presumption that a conveyance to trustees in a marriage-contract carried capital only.¹ The third parties contended that the decision in *Boyd's Trustees*¹ was based upon that in Mainwaring's Settlement,² which the English Courts had ceased to regard as authoritative. But though *Mainwaring*² might be impugned, in so far as it was decided upon the ground of the testator's intention, it was unassailable as regarded the crucial test which it proposed, namely, whether the property in dispute would "fit the trusts of the settlement." If that test were applied here, it was conclusive; for the second and third purposes of the marriage-contract trust were unintelligible and unworkable if they had any application to Mrs Henderson's liferent under her father's settlement.

Argued for the third parties,—The third parties were entitled to payment of the liferent for the purposes of the marriage-contract. The present case did not fall within the principle of *Boyd's Trustees*¹ and Young's Trustees,¹ for these cases only dealt with acquirenda. Here Mrs Henderson had already a vested interest in the liferent when she entered into the marriage-contract. The authority of *Mainwaring*² had been seriously questioned, if not overruled, in two subsequent English cases.³ The ground of intention on which *Boyd's Trustees*¹ had been partly decided had also been expressly repudiated, not only in Scholfield,³ but also in a recent Scottish case,⁴ which was in complete harmony with previous decisions,⁵ and ruled the present case.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The deceased Walter Montgomerie Neilson left his fortune, consisting of heritable estate and moveable investments, amounting as at the date of the case to £430,000, to trustees for distribution. He was survived by a son and a married daughter, Mrs Henderson. One-third of the residue was left to Mrs Henderson and her children in trust, the leading direction being that the trustees should hold and apply this share of residue for behoof of the testator's daughter in liferent, and any children to be born of her equally among them and their issue per stirpes in fee.

Mrs Henderson by her antenuptial contract of marriage assigned to trustees "the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated, now belonging to her or to which she may succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the said intended marriage." The second question in the case is, whether Mrs Henderson's "liferent" (which I take to mean the income accruing to her term by term) is payable to her

¹ Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd, July 13, 1877, 4 R. 1082; Young's Trustees, &c., May 22, 1885, 12 R. 968, cf. 22 S. L. R.; 2 Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, 910.

² 1866, L. R., 2 Eq. 487.

³ In re Allnut, 1882, 22 Ch. D. 275; Scholfield v. Spooner, 1884, 26 Ch. D. 94.

⁴ Simson's Trustees v. Brown, March 11, 1890, 17 R. 581.

⁵ Douglas's Trustees v. Kay's Trustees, Dec. 2, 1879, 7 R. 295, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 300; Newlands v. Miller, July 14, 1882, 9 R. 1104.

No. 200. or to her marriage trustees? Now, the purposes of the marriage trust are in the first place the payment of the "income" of the estate conveyed to her for life, and to her husband in the event of his survivance, and then the distribution of the "fee or capital" of the estate amongst the children of the marriage. If Mrs Henderson's income accruing under her father's trust is payable to her marriage trustees, it would be their duty to capitalise it and to pay her only the income of the accumulated fund. This seems perfectly clear on the terms of the marriage trust, though it is extremely improbable that anything of the kind was intended.

July 17, 1897.
Neilson's
Trustees v.
Henderson.

The case of *Boyd's Trustees*¹ is a direct authority on the question raised. It was there held by the Second Division of the Court that a general conveyance of wife's estate will not (unless the context necessitates such a construction) include the income of settled estate payable to her by trustees. This decision was approved by the First Division of the Court in the case of Young's Trustees,² and I am of opinion that we should follow it, the question in the present case being identical. In a certain sense, no doubt, an annuity payable by trustees is estate, but in another and very familiar use of the word "estate" it means an estate in fee, either land or invested money-capable of being immediately transferred, and the question is in which sense is the word here used. The expression is, "estate heritable and moveable, real and personal," words which certainly apply to a capital fund, but do not necessarily or invariably include income derived from a trust. The rule established in *Boyd's*¹ case recommends itself as expressing in the great majority of cases the probable intention of the parties, while the opposite construction is not only improbable but would be altogether unsuited to the usual purposes of a marriage trust. The rule is not to be taken in an absolute sense; if the parties make it clear that income is to be paid to trustees for the purpose of being accumulated in such a case, their intention will receive effect. Or again, if a marriage-contract sets forth that income falling under the trust is to be paid over to the spouses, I should take this to be an indication that the general conveyance was meant to include life interests. There is also the case where a wife has a proper liferent estate in land, a liferent estate in her own name. As to this I give no opinion; it is not directly ruled by the case of Boyd's Trustees,¹ on which my opinion is founded.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with Lord M'Laren. I think that this case is entirely ruled by *Boyd*¹ and Young.²

LORD KINNEAR and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT found and declared, in answer to the second question, that the liferent was not payable to Mrs Henderson's marriage-contract trustees.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—BELL & BANNERMAN, W.S.—
WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES JOHN YOUNG DALGARNO AND OTHERS (Brown's Trustees),

No. 201.

Pursuers (Respondents).—*Salvesen.*ALEXANDER MILNE, Defender (Appellant).—*W. Brown.*July 17, 1897.
Brown's
Trustees v.
Milne.

Process—Reponing—Sheriff—Decree by default—Failure to lodge defences and accounts—Sheriff Court Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 80), sec. 6—Sheriff Court Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 20.—In an action raised in the Sheriff Court by trustees against the law-agent to the trust, concluding for an accounting, and failing this, for payment of £500, the defender lodged no defences, but put in a minute craving the Court to sist proceedings in order to give him time to lodge his accounts, which he alleged would shew a debit balance against the trust. The Sheriff-substitute granted a sist for ten days, and at the end of that period, the defender having failed to lodge defences or produce his accounts, the Sheriff-substitute decerned for the sum sued for. On appeal the Sheriff, in respect of no appearance being made for the defender, dismissed the appeal. The defender having appealed to the Court of Session, and moved to be reponed, the Court (dub. Lord Adam), in respect that the sum sued for, and for which the Sheriff-substitute had granted decree, was a random sum, recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and remitted to the Sheriff to consider the defender's application to be reponed, and in the event of sufficient cause being shewn, and of his lodging accounts within eight days, to allow defences to be lodged within two days.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen on 29th March 1897 by the trustees under the trust-disposition of Mrs Margaret Brown and others against Alexander Milne, the law-agent of the trust. The action concluded for decree, ordaining the defender to produce an account of his intromissions with the trust funds, and failing his producing such account for payment of £500.

The pursuers averred that on 2d February 1897 the defender had written to the trustees undertaking to have the final accounts of the trust completed and in the hands of the trustees within fourteen days.

The defender lodged no defences, but put in the following minute:—

"The defender has in course of preparation the trust accounts, and expects to have them ready for production to the Court in the course of next week. The transactions extend over a considerable period of time, are numerous, and somewhat involved, and the labour of producing them is pretty considerable.

"The accounts will shew a debit balance against the trust-estate. . . .

"In respect of this minute the defender craves the Court to sist the process for a period of fourteen days to allow of the production of the accounts; or, alternatively, to pronounce an order for production of the accounts within the time specified."

On 12th May 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) sisted the cause for ten days to allow the defender's accounts to be produced.

On 26th May 1897 the Sheriff-substitute, on the motion of the pursuer's agent, in respect of defender's failure to lodge defences or produce the accounts in question, decerned against the defender for payment of £500, in terms of the second alternative conclusion of the prayer of the petition.*

* The Sheriff Courts Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 80), sec. 6, enacts,—"Where any condescendence or defences, or revised condescendence or revised defences, or other paper, shall not be given in within the periods

No. 201.

July 17, 1897.
Brown's
Trustees v.
Milne.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Crawford), who, on 15th June 1897, "in respect of no appearance for or by the defender and appellant at this diet," on the motion of the pursuers, dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.*

The defender appealed to the First Division.

The pursuers objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—The appeal was taken not for the purpose of review but with the object of having the appellant reponed. As an application for this latter purpose it was not worthy of consideration. The defender had deliberately neglected to comply with the forms of procedure and the order of the Sheriff-substitute. He had failed (1) to lodge defences, (2) to produce his accounts within the time allowed by the Sheriff-substitute, although he had obtained the sist for that purpose; (3) to appear in support of his appeal. His neglect necessarily led to the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute† and Sheriff,* and no reason had been given by him to justify this Court in interfering.¹ He had now had six months to produce his accounts since the first demand made upon him, and had not done so yet, although in his minute he only craved a delay of fourteen days.

Argued for the defender;—Owing to the complicated nature of the accounts it was natural that the defender should not be in a position to lodge his defences in time, or to produce the accounts at once. As regarded the failure to lodge formal defences, the minute was equivalent to defences. The defender had certainly been remiss, but it was for the Court to consider whether his neglect had been such as to deserve the great penalty which the Sheriff-substitute's decree imposed upon him. In the circumstances he should be reponed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If this gentleman had desired to be reponed, his natural and proper course would have been to apply to the Sheriff, and the prevailing opinion, with which I am loth to differ, seems to be that we had better relegate matters to their proper condition, in which they should have been placed by the action of the appellant. I am accordingly disposed to concur in the view that we should recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and remit to the Sheriff to consider any motion to be reponed that may be made by the appellant within eight days, provided he produces his accounts within that period.

LORD ADAM.—My feeling would have rather been to refuse the appeal, but I agree in the more moderate course which has been proposed.

prescribed or allowed by this Act, the Sheriff shall dismiss the action or decern in terms of the summons, as the case may be, by default, unless it shall be made to appear to his satisfaction that the failure to lodge such paper arose from unavoidable or reasonable causes, in which case the Sheriff may allow the same to be received on payment of such sum in name of expenses as he shall think just."

* The Sheriff Courts Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 70), sec. 20, enacts,—"Where in any defended action one of the parties fails to appear by himself or his agent at diet of proof, diet of debate, or other diet in the cause, it shall be in the power of the Sheriff to proceed in his absence, and unless a sufficient reason appear to the contrary he shall, whether a motion to that effect is made or not, pronounce decree as libelled, or of absolvitor (as the case may require), with expenses."

† See supra, p. 1139, note.

¹ McGibbon v. Thomson, July 14, 1877, 4 R. 1085.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. It was the duty of the appellant to have produced his accounts along with the note of appeal, or at all events before the case was moved in Single Bills, and he would then have been in a stronger position in asking to be reponed. If the session had not been near an end, we should probably have allowed him a few days to give in an account, but that being impossible, I think we should follow the course proposed.

No. 201.
July 17, 1897.
Brown's
Trustees v.
Milne.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think that in the general case a defender, against whom a decree by default has been pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute, has ample opportunity to be reponed against it by appealing to the Sheriff. If he appeals and does not appear to support his application to be reponed, I should in the general case have held that the matter was concluded against him here, and that the Court ought not to be asked to interfere at so late a period by giving the party a further opportunity for shewing that he may be restored against the consequences of his own default, when a sufficient opportunity has already been afforded to him, which—as his counsel admitted in the present case—has been neglected without any reasonable excuse. But I am much moved by the consideration which I understand has influenced your Lordships, that in this case, owing to the form of the action, decree is asked for payment by the defender of what may be described as a random sum, so that it may turn out that the penalty for failing to observe the orders of the Sheriff may be a more severe one than it would, if the whole circumstances were known to the Court, be reasonable to inflict. On that ground, I am disposed to concur in the view that we should give the defender another chance by allowing him to go back to the Sheriff, to satisfy him if he can by producing his accounts that he may be heard upon the merits.

LORD M'LAREN.—I should like to add that I concur in all that Lord Kinnear has said, and that we are entitled, for the reason that the decree is for an arbitrary sum, which the pursuer might state at any amount he pleased, to consider the case as one requiring exceptional treatment.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor: Remit to the Sheriff-principal to pronounce decree in terms of the said interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, unless within eight days sufficient cause is shewn to the contrary, and accounts are produced by the defender, and in the event of sufficient cause being shewn and accounts produced, to allow defences to be lodged within two days, and to remit to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed, and decern: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses incurred by them, both in the Sheriff Court and in this Court," &c.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—HENRY & SCOTT, W.S.—Agents.

No. 202. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, Complainer (Respondent).—D. Dunulas—Craigie.

July 17, 1897.*
Campbell v.
Bremner.

JOHN BREMNER, Respondent (Reclaimers).—*Salvesen—
A. S. D. Thomson.*

Superior and Vassal—Building Restrictions—Right of disponee of vassal to enforce restrictions against vassal—Deviation from restrictions.—By feu-contract dated in 1886 a portion of the lands of Holmhead was feued out by Stevenson to Bremner, under the restriction that one double villa and one single villa or three single villas should be erected on the ground, which villas “shall front the road or street forming the south-south-eastern boundary of the portion of ground hereby feued,” it being declared that no other buildings, except offices one storey high, should be erected on the ground feued, “which restrictions and prohibitions as to buildings are hereby created real liens, burdens, and servitudes upon and affecting the portion of ground above disposed in favour of the said” Stevenson “and his successors and the other feuars and disponees of other parts of the said lands of Holmhead, who shall be entitled to enforce the same against the said” Bremner “and his foreshaids and his or their disponees of any portion of ground above disposed.”

On part of the ground thus feued Bremner, in the same year, erected a house, which, with consent of the superior, faced west instead of south-south-east, as stipulated in the feu-contract.

This portion of the ground, with the house thereon, was subsequently disposed to Campbell, the disposition bearing that it was granted under burden of the restrictions in the feu-contract, “in so far as still subsisting and applicable thereto.”

Thereafter, by minute of agreement between the superior and Bremner, dated and recorded August 1895, the superior discharged the portion of the ground still belonging to Bremner of the restrictions above narrated, and Bremner proceeded to erect on the ground a continuous row of three houses facing west.

Campbell thereupon brought an action against Bremner for interdict against the erection of the houses, on the ground that they were in contravention of the feu-contract, in respect that they were a continuous row of houses.

The complainer ultimately admitted that if one or other of the two outmost houses had been separated from the middle house by a clear space of at least six inches, he would have had no legitimate objection to the houses.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) refused to grant interdict, on the ground, per Lord Justice-Clerk, that the complainer had no title to enforce the restriction, and per Lord Young and Lord Trayner that he had no interest to do so.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

By feu-contract entered into between John Wilson Stevenson, house factor in Glasgow, and John Bremner, measurer there, dated 7th and recorded in the Register of Sasines 14th May 1886, Stevenson disposed to Bremner all and whole the portion of ground therein described, extending to 5050 square yards or thereby, part of the lands of Holmhead, in the parish of Cathcart and county of Renfrew, and that always with and under “the real liens and burdens, conditions, provisions, irritancies, and reservations following, videlicet :—The said John Bremner shall erect on the said portion of ground, and have completed and ready for occupation by the term of Whitsunday 1887 one double villa of the value of not less than £1200 sterling, and not later than the term of Whitsunday 1888, one single villa of the value of not less than £600 sterling, or, in the option of the said John Bremner, three or more single villas, each of the value of not less than £600 sterling, which villas shall be built upon sites and according to plans and specifications to be first submitted to and approved of by the said James Wilson Stevenson, and shall front the road or street forming the south-south-eastern boundary of the portion of ground hereby feued: . . . And it is hereby expressly provided and declared that no buildings other than those hereby prescribed shall, in all time coming, be set down on the said portion of ground, excepting washing-houses, coal cellars or office houses for the use of the said villas, which shall be erected behind or to the back of the said villas only, and shall not be more than one storey in height, . . . which restrictions and prohibitions as to buildings are hereby created real liens and burdens and servitudes upon and affecting the portion of ground above disposed in favour of the said James Wilson Stevenson and his successors, and the other feuars and disponees of other parts of the said lands of Holmhead, who shall be entitled to enforce the same against the said John Bremner and his foresaids, and his or their disponees, of any part of the portion of ground above disposed. . . .”

No. 202.

July 17, 1897.
Campbell v.
Bremner.

On a part of the ground thus feued Bremner, with the consent of the superior, in 1886, erected a house across the end of the road above described as forming the south-south-eastern boundary of the ground, thus making the road a cul-de-sac. This road was about 200 feet long, branching eastwards from the Glasgow and Ayr turnpike road. As appeared from the description of the subjects in the feu-contract, it formed part only of the south-south-eastern boundary of the ground feued, the south-south-eastern boundary of the remainder (including the solum on which Bremner's house was built) being a part of the lands of Holmhead which had been feued out to another person. Bremner's house had its frontage to the branch road and thus faced westwards, instead of to the south, towards which it would have faced had it been built along the branch road and fronting towards it.

By disposition, dated 25th, and recorded 28th February 1889, Bremner conveyed to Samuel Hannah all and whole that plot or area of ground containing 2156 square yards or thereby, part of the above 5050 square yards, and including the house built by Bremner in 1886; and by disposition, dated 12th and 19th, and recorded the 20th May 1893, Hannah conveyed this 2156 yards to Alexander Campbell. Both dispositions were granted under the burdens as contained in the feu-contract of 1886, “so far as still subsisting and applicable thereto.”

By disposition, dated 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th July, and recorded 13th August 1895, the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Stevenson, the superior, conveyed the superiority of the 5050 yards to Andrew Paul, writer, Glasgow, under exception of the 2156 yards belonging to Campbell, and of 608 yards belonging to David Lindsay.

By minute of agreement between Paul and Bremner, dated 12th, and recorded 13th August 1895, on the narrative that Paul was immediate lawful superior, and Campbell, proprietor of the dominium utile of the lands therein mentioned, being the lands of which Paul had acquired the superiority under the disposition last mentioned, it was, inter alia, agreed as follows:—“Further, the said Andrew Paul hereby discharges the stipulation in the said feu-contract entered into between the said James Wilson Stevenson and the said John Bremner,”

No. 202. dated 7th, and recorded 14th May 1886, "in regard to the value of the cottages or lodgings to be erected on the said ground, and as to the portion thereof, and hereby grants special permission to erect lodgings of the value of not less than £450, and, in the option of the said John Bremner, to front the same to the said road leading to the said turnpike road, or to the said road or street forming the southern boundary hereof, and known as Windsor Villas, or to both."

July 17, 1897.
Campbell v.
Bremner.

In February 1896 Campbell, the proprietor of the 2156 square yards disposed by Bremner in 1889, and of the house built thereon by Bremner in 1886, presented a note of suspension and interdict, praying to have Bremner interdicted from erecting three houses on the portion of the 5050 square yards still belonging to him (being the portion which was the subject of the minute of agreement above referred to), on the ground that the houses were disconform to the restrictions in the feu-contract.

The grounds of disconformity averred on record were (1) that the three houses instead of having their frontage to the branch road, i.e. to the south, faced the Glasgow and Ayr Road, i.e., faced west; and (2) that the three houses instead of being separate or semi-detached houses formed a continuous row.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) On a sound construction of said feu-contract, the complainer is entitled to have the conditions therein as to the erection of villas enforced, and the respondent being in the course of erecting buildings on part of the ground contained in said feu-contract of a nature, value, and with a frontage disconform to the conditions set forth in said deed, to the prejudice of the complainer, the complainer is entitled to suspension and interdict, as craved.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (6) The note should be refused because—(1) The superior has approved of and sanctioned the sites and plans of the said villas; (2) the frontage of complainer's house being a deviation from the contract, he is barred from objecting to the respondent's fronting his villas in the same direction; (3) the provision as to frontage having been abandoned by all parties interested, both before and since the complainer acquired his property, he cannot enforce it; and (4) the provisions in the feu-contract as to villas are not created real liens and burdens in favour of the complainer, and he has no title to found thereupon.

The complainer ultimately abandoned his first ground of objection to the respondent's houses. He admitted that as his own house (that built in 1886) fronted to the west he could not object to the respondent's houses fronting in the same direction.

With respect to the other ground of objection, it appeared that two of the respondent's houses were finished and had a mutual gable, and the complainer admitted that to these two houses per se he could take no objection in respect that they were semi-detached houses, and so were not prohibited by the feu-contract. The third house was to the south of the other two, and was practically finished at the date of the present proceedings. Its north wall, which was very thin, was attached to the south wall of the middle house by iron straps, and thus formed a continuous row with the other two. At the hearing in the Inner-House the complainer admitted that if the third or southmost house had been six inches apart from the middle house, he would have had no ground of objection to the houses, but he maintained that as actually erected they were struck at by the prohibitions of the feu-contract.

On 28th April 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced No. 202. this interlocutor:—"Finds that the complainer and respondent are proprietors of coterminous portions of ground feued out by the same feu-contract, and both subject to the conditions and restrictions expressed in the said feu-contract: Finds that in these circumstances the complainer has a good and sufficient title to enforce against the respondent the said conditions and restrictions: Finds that upon the just construction of the said feu-contract the feuars are restricted to the erection, on the ground feued, of houses which are either double villas or single villas—that is to say, houses either semi-detached or wholly detached, as distinguished from houses (three or more) forming a continuous row: Finds that the respondent, having erected a double villa on the ground belonging to him, has recently erected, or is in course of erecting, a third house which is not a double villa or single villa in the sense of the feu-contract, but is so placed and attached with reference to the existing double villa as to convert the block into a continuous row of three houses: Finds that this erection is in contravention of the feu-contract and of the complainer's rights: . . . continues the cause, and grants leave to reclaim."

July 17, 1897.
Campbell v.
Bremner.

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The complainer had no title to enforce the restrictions in the feu-contract. The right to enforce the restrictions was not conferred on the disponees of parts of the lands feued, who were servient owners only, but on the superior and on feuars from him of other parts of the lands of Holmhead, and division of a servient tenement could not make one of the parts of the divided tenement into a dominant tenement as regarded the other.¹ To imply a jus quæsitum in a feuar to enforce restrictions there must have been either feuing in accordance with a common plan and general restrictions applicable to a considerable area.² Here neither condition was fulfilled. (2) The complainer had no interest to enforce the restrictions, and therefore was not entitled to have them enforced. The only objection to the houses now insisted in was that the south-most house was not at least six inches apart from the middle house. The complainer had no interest to enforce such an objection. (3) The restrictions had, with the consent of the superior, been abandoned.

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The complainer had a title to enforce the restrictions. The case of *Dalrymple v. Herdman*³ was a direct authority, and ruled the present. (2) The complainer had a sufficient interest to enforce the restrictions; and (3) these restrictions, so far as now sought to be enforced, had not been abandoned.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—During the whole course of this argument I have been endeavouring to ascertain what the complainer hoped to gain by this action. We have now been told that all he has to complain of is that a certain house is built up against another house instead of being six inches away from it. Mr Craigie has frankly admitted that if the house in question was taken down and built up again six inches apart from the next

¹ Johnstone v. MacRitchie, March 15, 1893, 20 R. 539, per Lord Rutherford Clark, at p. 551.

² Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95, per Lord Watson, at p. 102; Miller v. Carmichael, July 19, 1888, 15 R. 991, per Lord Young, at p. 995.

³ Dalrymple v. Herdman, June 5, 1878, 5 R. 847.

No. 202. house he would have no good ground of complaint. That is a very small matter to have all this litigation about.

July 17, 1897.
Campbell v.
Bremner.

The history of the case is as follows:—By feu-contract, dated 7th May 1886, a portion of ground containing 5050 square yards was feued to John Bremner. In course of time he conveyed part of this ground to Mr Hannah, from whom Mr Campbell, the complainer, acquired it, and, as I understand, he now occupies it. In these circumstances, the complainer proposes to found on a building restriction contained in the original feu-contract. Now, I quite understand that if a superior feus out a piece of ground to a number of feuars subject to building restrictions applicable in common to them all, these restrictions can be enforced by one feuair against another if there is community of interest. If the complainer here were such a feuair he might have a right to enforce the restrictions in the original feu-contract. But this is not a case of that kind at all. This is the case of a person who has acquired a part of the ground originally feued from the original feuair under burden of certain restrictions contained in the feu-contract, and he now comes asking us to enforce these restrictions against the original feuair, his author. I think that he has no right to do so. The superior was undoubtedly entitled to discharge the restrictions imposed by the feu-contract. I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is not well founded, and should be set aside.

LORD YOUNG.—The complainer's case is most clearly expressed in his first plea in law—[His Lordship read the plea]. Now, what is alleged is that the respondent is in course of erecting three houses adjoining one another and pointing west, whereas he was only entitled to erect one or two. He might have erected a building of exactly similar dimensions to that complained of, or two such buildings, but it is said that he is not entitled to erect such a building if it is divided internally into three houses. The complainer says that would be to his prejudice. It is also said that these buildings have been erected in contravention of the complainer's rights in respect of their frontage, because it is prescribed by the feu-contract that the villas shall front the road or street forming the south-south-eastern boundary of the portion of ground thereby feued. That provision of the feu-contract is not insisted in now, but it is one of the provisions contained in the feu-contract, and it has been violated. That is a most material part of the condition as to building. The villas are to front towards the south-south-east. But that condition was violated, and it was violated as long ago as 1886, and by the erection, with the consent and approbation of the superior, of the house now owned and occupied by the complainer. He knew that the conditions as to building contained in the feu-contract had been violated, and that this had been done with the consent of the superior. There is nothing to shew that any reasonable objection can be taken to this form of house if it fronts otherwise than to the south-south-east. We cannot sustain one condition when others contained in the same feu-contract have been departed from.

I further think there is a great deal to be said for the view that the complainer has no title to found on these restrictions at all.

Irrespective of that consideration, however, which would be sufficient for the decision of the case, I am of opinion—and that also is sufficient for the decision of the case—that the complainer has suffered no prejudice. No. 202.

I think the grounds of suspension are insufficient, and that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. July 17, 1897.
Campbell v. Bremner.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The complaint here is that the respondent is doing something in violation of the provisions of his title to the prejudice of the complainer, and that the complainer has an interest in having the violation complained of put a stop to.

The complainer's interest is of the most shadowy kind. We are told that the house in question is not a separate and distinct house. The only objection to it is that there is no space between it and the house next to it. It is admitted that if there had been a space of even six inches between the houses that would have been enough to avoid the complainer's present objection. The complainer's interest is therefore scarcely appreciable.

But that is not the only question. In some cases a feuar may have a title to enforce restrictions without being called upon to qualify any very substantial interest. I am of opinion that this case does not belong to that class.

The complainer derives his right from Mr Bremner under the disposition in his favour, which conveys to him a certain piece of ground, under the burdens contained in the original feu-contract, "so far as still subsisting and applicable thereto." But for what purpose are these burdens imposed upon him? Not to give him a community of interest with other feuars, which would entitle him to enforce these burdens against them, but so that he might be bound to observe the restrictions himself, and so relieve Bremner. But, further, the original feu-contract provides that the "restrictions and prohibitions as to buildings are hereby created real liens and burdens and servitudes upon and affecting the portion of ground above disposed, in favour of the said James Wilson Stevenson and his successors, and the other feuars and disponees of other parts of the said lands of Holmhead, who shall be entitled to enforce the same against the said John Bremner and his foressaids and his or their disponees of any part of the portion of ground above disposed." Now, in conferring this right upon "the feuars and disponees of other parts of the said lands of Holmhead," the feu-contract would seem to exclude any such right in a disponee of part of the portion of land feued to Bremner.

In such cases the presumption is in favour of liberty—that a proprietor may do as he chooses with his own property. I think the complainer's title to enforce these restrictions is more than doubtful, and it is practically admitted that he has no interest.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Repel the reasons of suspension and interdict, and refuse the note of suspension and interdict, and decern: Find the complainer liable in expenses, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax, and to report."

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—J. STEWART GELLATLY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 202. house he would have no good ground of complaint. That is a very small matter to have all this litigation about.

July 17, 1897.
Campbell v.
Bremner.

The history of the case is as follows:—By feu-contract, dated 7th May 1886, a portion of ground containing 5050 square yards was feued to John Bremner. In course of time he conveyed part of this ground to Mr Hannah, from whom Mr Campbell, the complainer, acquired it, and, as I understand, he now occupies it. In these circumstances, the complainer proposes to found on a building restriction contained in the original feu-contract. Now, I quite understand that if a superior feus out a piece of ground to a number of feuars subject to building restrictions applicable in common to them all, these restrictions can be enforced by one feuar against another if there is community of interest. If the complainer here were such a feuar he might have a right to enforce the restrictions in the original feu-contract. But this is not a case of that kind at all. This is the case of a person who has acquired a part of the ground originally feued from the original feuar under burden of certain restrictions contained in the feu-contract, and he now comes asking us to enforce these restrictions against the original feuar, his author. I think that he has no right to do so. The superior was undoubtedly entitled to discharge the restrictions imposed by the feu-contract. I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is not well founded, and should be set aside.

LORD YOUNG.—The complainer's case is most clearly expressed in his first plea in law—[His Lordship read the plea]. Now, what is alleged is that the respondent is in course of erecting three houses adjoining one another and pointing west, whereas he was only entitled to erect one or two. He might have erected a building of exactly similar dimensions to that complained of, or two such buildings, but it is said that he is not entitled to erect such a building if it is divided internally into three houses. The complainer says that would be to his prejudice. It is also said that these buildings have been erected in contravention of the complainer's rights in respect of their frontage, because it is prescribed by the feu-contract that the villas shall front the road or street forming the south-south-eastern boundary of the portion of ground thereby feued. That provision of the feu-contract is not insisted in now, but it is one of the provisions contained in the feu-contract, and it has been violated. That is a most material part of the condition as to building. The villas are to front towards the south-south-east. But that condition was violated, and it was violated as long ago as 1886, and by the erection, with the consent and approbation of the superior, of the house now owned and occupied by the complainer. He knew that the conditions as to building contained in the feu-contract had been violated, and that this had been done with the consent of the superior. There is nothing to shew that any reasonable objection can be taken to this form of house if it fronts otherwise than to the south-south-east. We cannot sustain one condition when others contained in the same feu-contract have been departed from.

I further think there is a great deal to be said for the view that the complainer has no title to found on these restrictions at all.

Irrespective of that consideration, however, which would be sufficient for the decision of the case, I am of opinion—and that also is sufficient for the decision of the case—that the complainer has suffered no prejudice. No. 202.

I think the grounds of suspension are insufficient, and that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

July 17, 1897.
Campbell v.
Bremner.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The complaint here is that the respondent is doing something in violation of the provisions of his title to the prejudice of the complainer, and that the complainer has an interest in having the violation complained of put a stop to.

The complainer's interest is of the most shadowy kind. We are told that the house in question is not a separate and distinct house. The only objection to it is that there is no space between it and the house next to it. It is admitted that if there had been a space of even six inches between the houses that would have been enough to avoid the complainer's present objection. The complainer's interest is therefore scarcely appreciable.

But that is not the only question. In some cases a feuar may have a title to enforce restrictions without being called upon to qualify any very substantial interest. I am of opinion that this case does not belong to that class.

The complainer derives his right from Mr Bremner under the disposition in his favour, which conveys to him a certain piece of ground, under the burdens contained in the original feu-contract, "so far as still subsisting and applicable thereto." But for what purpose are these burdens imposed upon him? Not to give him a community of interest with other feuars, which would entitle him to enforce these burdens against them, but so that he might be bound to observe the restrictions himself, and so relieve Bremner. But, further, the original feu-contract provides that the "restrictions and prohibitions as to buildings are hereby created real liens and burdens and servitudes upon and affecting the portion of ground above disposed, in favour of the said James Wilson Stevenson and his successors, and the other feuars and disponees of other parts of the said lands of Holmhead, who shall be entitled to enforce the same against the said John Bremner and his foresaids and his or their disponees of any part of the portion of ground above disposed." Now, in conferring this right upon "the feuars and disponees of other parts of the said lands of Holmhead," the feu-contract would seem to exclude any such right in a disponee of part of the portion of land feued to Bremner.

In such cases the presumption is in favour of liberty—that a proprietor may do as he chooses with his own property. I think the complainer's title to enforce these restrictions is more than doubtful, and it is practically admitted that he has no interest.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Repel the reasons of suspension and interdict, and refuse the note of suspension and interdict, and decern: Find the complainer liable in expenses, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax, and to report."

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—J. STEWART GELLATLY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 203.

THE PARK YARD COMPANY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Pursuers
(Respondents).—*C. J. Guthrie—Burnet.*July 17, 1897.
Park Yard Co.,
Limited, v.
North British
Railway Co.THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Asher—Cooper.

Servitude—Tramway—Agreement—Personal or Real—Right of singular successor of proprietor to demand removal of tramway.—Terms of an agreement between the proprietor of the estate of W., feuers of parts of that estate, and a railway company, providing for the construction, by the railway company, of a tramway through the lands of W., including the portions feued out, which was held not to be intended to bind, and not binding on, singular successors of the feuers.

Road—Public right of way—Title to sue—Railway Company.—Held by Lord Low (Ordinary) that a railway company had no title to sue a declarator of right of way in the public interest.

1st Division.
Lord Low.

THIS was an action at the instance of the Park Yard Company, Limited, George Smellie, and Edward John Hill, proprietors of feus on the estate of Whiteinch, against the North British Railway Company and others, for declarator that the pursuers, as proprietors of subjects, were entitled to hold the same for their respective interests therein, free of any burden or servitude alleged by the defenders, and in particular of the right claimed by the North British Railway Company to maintain and use a tramway upon the solum thereof. The pursuers also concluded for decree ordaining the North British Railway Company to remove the tramway so far as constructed on the solum of the subjects belonging to the pursuers.

The defenders, the North British Railway Company, founded upon two agreements, the first of which provided for the construction, and the second for the working of the tramway, which the pursuers sought to have removed from their lands.

The first of these agreements, dated 10th May 1872, and subsequent dates down to 23d May 1873, was concluded between Archibald Smith of Jordanhill, of the first part, the North British Railway Company, of the second part, the Whiteinch Railway Company, Limited, of the third part, and James Gray Lawrie and others, of the fourth part. The agreement proceeded on the narrative that the first party was proprietor of the unfeued portions, and superior of the feued-out portions of the lands of Whiteinch; that the fourth parties were proprietors of the dominium utile of portions of the lands of Whiteinch, fronting South Street; that the third parties proposed to lay down, upon part of the lands of Scotstoun, which marched with Whiteinch, and also upon part of Whiteinch, a railway and tramway to communicate with the railway of the second party at Stobcross and to terminate on the lands of Whiteinch; that certain of the second, third, and fourth parties had entered into an agreement, dated 16th May 1872 and subsequent dates, for the working of the railway and tramway; and that the first party, having been assured that the construction and use of the tramway would be for the benefit not only of his present but of his future feuers, had, along with the whole other parties for their respective rights and interests, agreed to the construction of the tramway on the following conditions:—“(First) That the said first party shall allow the third party to construct and lay, at their own expense, a tramway on the lands of Whiteinch, and that from the western boundary of the said lands eastward along unfeued ground till it reaches the western extremity of South Street, and thence, with consent of said first party and fourth parties, along South Street to the eastern extremity of the ground belonging to said Barclay, Curle, & Company" [one of the fourth parties]

 "and in the option of the first party and his successors, and when required by them, to continue the said tramway from the last mentioned point eastwards to the eastern march of the said lands of Whiteinch; but under this express provision and condition that at any time, without assigning any reason, it shall be competent for the said first party or his factor to call upon the third party or their successors, by requisition in writing, to flit the said tramway so far as lying to the west of the east side of Hill Street, Whiteinch, and to deviate the same so as to connect the said tramway on the said grounds of Scotstoun with the said tramway in said South Street to the east of said Hill Street, on a site to be provided by the first party, and to which deviation the third party shall be bound to obtain such consent of the first party's present feuars in Hill Street, as he, the first party or his foresaid, may think necessary, but the said first party shall be bound to stipulate with his future feuars along said Hill Street and South Street for power to form the said tramway without their consent, and which requisition the third party bind and oblige themselves and their successors to implement and fulfil."

No. 203.

July 17, 1897.
 Park Yard Co.,
 Limited, v.
 North British
 Railway Co.

The second article contained stipulations as to the manner in which the tramway should be laid, and the streets through which it passed causewayed, and provided that the work when completed "shall be kept by the said second party and their successors in thorough good order and condition, and so as not to interfere with the ordinary traffic of the public on said streets, and to the satisfaction of the first party or his factor." In the fourth place, it was provided "that the said third party and their successors shall fence and enclose the said tramway where it passes through the first party's unfenced lands on both sides and shall also put hung gates at the east and west boundaries of the unfenced ground, and afterwards maintain and uphold said fences and gates in good order and repair so long as said ground is unfenced and said tramway exists, all to the satisfaction of the first party or his factor." The agreement further provided:—"(Seventh) That the said tramway, so far as upon the said lands of Whiteinch, shall be used solely for the conveyance of traffic to and from the works situated upon the said lands of Whiteinch and in the lands of Scotstoun, and it shall not be used for the conveyance of traffic to the east of the first party's said lands; neither shall it be connected with any tramway which may be made to the east of the said lands, without the consent in writing of the first party or his successors, and the first party shall have power to call upon the second and third party or their successors to form and make as many sidings as may be necessary or required to connect the unfenced lands of Whiteinch with said tramway, and in feuing his unfenced lands he shall also have power to confer upon his feuars right to have such accesses formed with said branch tramway all for traffic as above stated; and it is hereby specially agreed to that the said first party and his said future feuars shall be placed upon the same footing and shall have the like rights and privileges in all respects in regard to the conveyance of traffic to and from their works and ground, the rates thereof and the rates and passage of the traffic over the North British Railway Company's own lines, or those under

No. 203. their control by lease or otherwise, as if they had been parties to the said agreement of date the 16th May 1872, and subsequent dates: July 17, 1897. (Eighth) In the event of the said tramway ceasing to be used, the Park Yard Co., first party, or his successors, or their factor, without the consent of Limited, v. the fourth parties, or any of them; and also the fourth parties, with North British the consent of the first party, or his successors, or their factor, shall Railway Co. have full power, and the privilege of constructing said tramway is conferred on this express condition, to call upon the third party, or their successors, by written requisition . . . to lift and remove, within six months of the date of said notice, the said tramway and whole works connected therewith, so far as on the said lands of Whiteinch or streets thereon, or any part thereof, and to restore and leave the said lands and streets, and also the fences, in good order and condition, to the satisfaction of the first party or his successors or factor. (Ninth) Nothing herein or in the said agreement between the said second and third and certain of the said fourth parties before narrated shall be understood . . . as entitling the said Whiteinch Railway Company to transfer to the said North British Railway Company or any other party any right in reference to the said tramway either permanent or temporary except the right to lay and use the same through the property of the said first party and his feuars in the way and manner foresaid, and that only subject to the obligation . . . to deviate and remove the same in the events before referred to and subject to the whole other conditions herein contained as to the use thereof before mentioned: (Lastly) That the consent of the said first party and also of the [fourth] party to the formation of said branch tramway and the work and maintenance thereof, shall not be held as warranting their respective powers to confer the same, it being distinctly understood that no warrantice and no privilege in perpetuity, notwithstanding anything in the foresaid agreement to the contrary, is given by them respectively, but simply their respective consent thereto under the conditions foresaid, and of its removal as aforesaid; and the whole parties hereto consent to registration hereof for preservation and execution."

The agreement of 16th May 1872 and subsequent dates (referred to in the agreement above narrated) was entered into between the North British Railway Company, of the first part, the Whiteinch Railway Company, Limited, of the second part, and James Gray Lawrie and others, owners and occupiers of works at Whiteinch (being certain of the fourth parties to the preceding agreement), of the third part. It provided as follows:—First, That the proposed branch railway connecting with Stobcross Junction, of which the tramway through Whiteinch was to form part, should be constructed by the second parties; that, when so constructed, the first parties should enter upon and use the said branch for the conveyance of all traffic, and should "thereafter in perpetuity work and manage . . . the traffic upon and maintain the said branch railway," and that the said railway, so far as on the lands of Whiteinch, should be constructed and worked subject to the provisions of the agreement already narrated. Fourth, the third parties were to be bound to forward and receive and cause to be sent via the said railway and the railways of the first parties all their traffic, so far as under their control, and the first parties were to be bound to convey such traffic to its destination with due despatch. Articles 5, 6, and 7 related to the rates to be charged for the conveyance of traffic, and their division between the first and second parties. The agreement further provided, eighth, No. 203. that it should be in the option of the first parties within four years, after its opening to purchase the branch railway on certain terms ; ninth, that notwithstanding said purchase the third parties should be bound to send, and the first parties to take, the said goods on the terms before mentioned ; and, tenth, that the agreement should be contingent on the second parties being able to make arrangements with the owners and occupiers of the lands, the road trustees, and other parties interested, for the acquisition of the lands required for the formation of the railway.

July 17, 1897.
 Park Yard Co.,
 Limited, v.
 North British
 Railway Co.

In terms of the agreement first above mentioned, the tramway was constructed by the Whiteinch Company, and thereafter by disposition dated in January and February, and recorded in February 1881, the Whiteinch Company, with the consent of the third parties to the agreement second above mentioned, or their successors, disposed to trustees for behoof of the North British Railway Company, "All and Whole the undertaking of us, the said Whiteinch Railway Company, Limited, and particularly without prejudice to said generality : . . . Septimo, All and Whole all right, which we, the said Whiteinch Railway Company, Limited, have in and to the tramway constructed and laid by us on the lands of Whiteinch" under the agreement first above mentioned. The clause of warrandice was in the following terms :—"And we, the said Whiteinch Railway Company, Limited, grant warrandice, and the said consenters grant warrandice, from fact and deed only, excepting always therefrom the conveyance to said tramway, which we, the said granters hereof do not warrant in any way."

In 1890 the Park Yard Company, Limited, acquired the feu of James Gray Lawrie, who had been a party to the above agreements, and in 1895 George Smellie and Edward John Hill acquired the superiority of said feu as trustees for the Park Yard Company.

In 1896 the Park Yard Company and George Smellie, and Edward John Hill, brought this action against the North British Railway Company, the proprietor of the lands of Whiteinch and others.

The North British Railway Company averred that the pursuers, when they acquired the subjects described in the summons, were well aware of the existence of the tramway, and of the terms of the agreements under which it had been constructed, and was being worked.

The North British Railway Company pleaded ;—6. These defenders should be assolizied from the conclusions of the summons, so far as affecting them, in respect that— . . . (b) The land in question is burdened with a servitude in favour of these defenders, by which they are entitled to maintain and use the said tramway and land for purposes of passage and the conveyance of goods thereon. (c) The land in question is a public road or street. (d) The land in question is subject to a public right of way. . . . (f) These defenders, under the agreements founded on by them, are entitled to maintain and use the tramway as laid. 7. The tramway in question having been constructed and in use at and prior to the time of acquisition of their property by the pursuers, and the pursuers having been fully aware, when they purchased the property, of the said agreements and of these defenders' rights and interests in the said tramway, the pursuers are barred from insisting in the present action.

On 9th March 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Low) repelled the defences,

No. 203. and decreed against the defenders conform to the conclusions of the summons.*

July 17, 1897.

Park Yard Co.,
Limited, v.
North British
Railway Co.

* "OPINION.— . . . The first question upon the merits is whether the North British Company have a right of servitude over the pursuer's lands, which entitles them to have a tramway upon these lands.

"The tramway was originally laid down in pursuance of an agreement called the construction agreement, entered into in May 1872. (His Lordship here referred to the terms of the agreement.)

"There is no obligation in the agreement to convey any land for the purpose of the tramway, nor is anything said in regard to the Whiteinch Company or the North British Company having any right in or to the lands. The contract appears to me to be a purely personal contract on the part of the superior and the feuars which would not transmit against a singular successor in the lands along with the lands. I do not think that it is possible to spell out of the contract the constitution of a right of servitude, and there is this insuperable difficulty that there is no dominant tenement. It was said that the dominant tenement was the part of the tramway passing through the lands of Scotstoun. That does not appear from the agreement, and further the tramway was not made at the time of the agreement, and I imagine that the Whiteinch Company had not even acquired the land on the Scotstoun estate upon which the tramway was to be constructed, because the company was not registered until after the date of the agreement.

"There was another agreement (referred to as the working agreement), which, although it was executed of a later date than the construction agreement, appears to have been arranged at the same time. (After referring to the terms of this agreement, his Lordship continued)—

"That was a purely working agreement, and could not enlarge the right which the North British Company and the Whiteinch Company had acquired under the construction agreement.

"I think that the working agreement also shews that it was intended that the Whiteinch Company should acquire the lands required for the formation of the tramway, because section 10 provides,—'This agreement shall be contingent on the second parties being able to make arrangements with the owners and occupiers of the lands, the road trustees, and others interested, for the acquisition of the lands required for the formation of the said railway.'

"That section, however, may refer to the acquisition of lands on the Scotstoun estate, but if so, it confirms what I have already indicated, that when the construction agreement was made there was no subject which could be the dominant tenement in the alleged servitude.

"The tramway was constructed by the Whiteinch Company, and subsequently the undertaking of that company was acquired by the North British Company, in terms of an agreement dated 12th September 1878, to which the feuars, who had been parties to the working agreement, were parties.

"The North British Company founded strongly upon the first clause of that agreement, which is quoted in their answer to the fifth article of the condescendence. The part of the clause upon which they found is that in which the feuars (including James Gray Lawrie) declare that from the 1st October 1878 they shall 'cease to have any right of ownership in the' undertaking. Now, it is not stated what interest these parties had in the undertaking of the Whiteinch Company, but to give up any right of ownership which they might have in the undertaking was a very different thing from giving up the right of ownership to land upon which part of the tramway had been constructed. It is impossible, in my opinion, to read the agreement of 1878 as amounting to a conveyance to the Whiteinch Company of the land in question in this case.

"The agreement of 1878 was followed in 1881 by a conveyance to the

The defenders, the North British Railway Company, reclaimed.

No. 203.

In the course of the debate in the Inner-House the pursuers were allowed to amend the summons by inserting in the declaratory conclusion,—“without prejudice to any public right of way that may be established along the said mentioned boundary.”

July 17, 1897.
Park Yard Co.,
Limited, v.
North British
Railway Co.

Argued for the reclaimers, the North British Railway Company;—The agreement for the construction of the tramway constituted a servitude over the lands of the fourth parties in favour of the two railway companies, the dominant tenement being the railway through the neighbouring estate, which connected with the tramway. The agreement conferred upon the two companies a right intended to be permanent. This appeared from, inter alia, the stipulation requiring the consent of the superior to the removal of the tramway, the careful provisions as to the manner in which it should be laid, and the stipulation that the first party might require sidings to be made to connect the tramway with his unfeued lands. The provision that removal of the tramway might be demanded if it ceased to be used implied that it was to be permanent so long as used. The last clause did not derogate from the right previously given, the words against perpetuity having been inserted to save the provision that removal of the tramway might be required if it ceased to be used. The meaning of the last clause was merely that the fourth parties' consent should not bind them further than they were bound by the preceding clauses of the deed. Further,

North British Company by the Whiteinch Company of their undertaking, with consent of the feuers, who were parties to that agreement.

“By the conveyance the Whiteinch Company disposed to the North British Company a number of plots of land to which they had acquired right, and the right also which they had acquired to cross certain public roads. The conveyance of the tramway, in so far as it was upon the lands of Whiteinch, ran thus,—‘All and Whole all right which we, the Whiteinch Railway Company, Limited, have in and to the tramway constructed and laid by us on the lands of Whiteinch, under and in terms of’ the construction agreement.

“The warrandice clause was in the following terms:—‘And we, the said Whiteinch Railway Company, Limited, grant warrandice, and the said consenters grant warrandice, from fact and deed only, excepting always therefrom the conveyance to said tramway, which the granters hereof do not warrant in any way.’

“I think therefore that this conveyance of the undertaking clearly recognises that the Whiteinch Company had no title to the land upon which the tramway, in so far as it passed through the Whiteinch estate, was laid.

“The North British Company further state that the land upon which the tramway is laid is a public right of way.

“I do not think that that is a relevant defence. The railway company appear to me to have neither interest nor title to maintain it.

“Assuming that the public have, by prescriptive use, acquired a right of way over the line traversed by the tramway, that would not, in my opinion, aid the railway company. The fact that the pursuers' lands were burdened with a public right of way would not disentitle them to have it declared that the lands were not also burdened with a servitude or other right on the part of the railway company, entitling them to have a tramway. I therefore do not think that the railway company have any interest in the question of public right of way.

“Further, I think they have no title to raise the question. It is not the function of a railway company, and they have not the power, to sue a declarator of right of way in the public interest. . . .”

No. 203. the construction agreement was to be read along with the working agreement, and the tenor of the latter agreement supported the view that the right conferred was intended to be permanent. The fact that the working agreement contained certain personal contracts, such as those dealing with the rates to be charged, did not derogate from its effect in other respects. A servitude could be constituted by grant followed by possession, although the deed conferring the right did not enter the Register of Sasines.¹ A positive servitude, which was not one of the ordinary predial servitudes, e.g., a right to cut wood, might be thus conferred.² The servitude now claimed was not of an unprecedented character.³ Where two parties entered into an agreement de futuro involving large outlay, and prescribing no definite limit to the right conferred, the presumption was that the agreement was intended to be permanent.⁴ (2) At all events the agreement was good against singular successors, who had purchased in knowledge of it,⁵ and it was averred that the pursuers had so purchased. (3) In any event the servitude claimed was duly constituted by the recorded disposition granted to the defenders by the Whiteinch Company, with the consent of, inter alios, the pursuers' predecessor. Disposition and sasine was the best means of constituting a servitude,⁶ and a conveyance granted with consent of the true owner was effectual.⁷

July 17, 1897.
Park Yard Co.,
Limited, v.
North British
Railway Co.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The agreements were not intended to impose a permanent obligation on the feuars. So far as they were concerned, there was no reference made to "successors," and the whole tenor of the two agreements, and in particular the last clause of the construction agreement, shewed that no perpetual obligation was intended to be created. (2) Even if a comparison of the different clauses of the two agreements should ultimately lead to the view that a permanent right was intended to be conferred, knowledge of agreements so ambiguous in their character would not bring a purchaser within the rule of the cases cited. (3) The disposition did not change the rights of parties under the agreements.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—It was remarked by the reclaimers' counsel that the two agreements upon which they found are to be read together; and this is quite true. At the same time the construction agreement is that upon which the question between the parties really turns. My opinion is that, when read along with the working agreement, as well as in its own terms, it is not conceived as an agreement binding singular successors in the lands of the vassals, and was not intended to affect them. Three considerations at least lead to this conclusion.

¹ Cowan v. Stewart, May 24, 1872, 10 Macph. 735.

² Garden v. Earl of Aboyne, 1734, M. 14,517.

³ Addie v. Henderson and Dimmack, Nov. 10, 1863, 2 Macph. 41, 36 Scot. Jur. 18.

⁴ Llanelly Railway and Dock Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 1875, L. R., 7 (H. L.) 556.

⁵ Petrie v. Forsyth, Dec. 16, 1874, 2 R. 214; Stoddart v. Dalzell, Dec. 16, 1876, 4 R. 236; Muirhead v. Glasgow Highland Society, Jan. 15, 1864, 2 Macph. 420, 36 Scot. Jur. 201; Kelvin-side Estate Co. v. Donaldson's Trustees, June 5, 1879, 6 R. 995.

⁶ Bell's Prin. sec. 990.

⁷ Ersk. ii. 3. 21; Buchan v. Cockburn, 1739, 1 Ross' Leading Cases, 33.

1. The first arises from the language of the deed. Where it is intended to impose an obligation which is to affect singular successors, it is reasonable to expect that the words of obligation should express this idea. In this deed, not merely is there an omission to bind the successors of the fourth parties, but that omission derives point from the fact that the deed expressly binds the successors of the reclaimers, and also expresses certain obligations in favour of the superior as prestable also to his successors. No. 203.

2. The reclaimers were constrained to allow in argument that certain important obligations in the agreement affecting the fourth parties are only personal, and were not intended to affect singular successors. I refer particularly to the clauses binding the feuars to send their traffic to the reclaimers, and the corresponding clauses giving them special rates. Now, it is extremely difficult to hold that, while this part of the agreement would not apply to singular successors, there should yet survive and affect them an obligation to keep the tramway on their lands. The proper way to test the question is to suppose that all the feus have been sold, and that none of the purchasers trade with the reclaimers. Then, as regards the continued existence of the tramway itself, both parties must be bound, if either. According to the reclaimers' argument, they would be bound to keep the tramway there, although they were getting no traffic, while the new feuars would be bound to submit to it, although it was doing no good to them or to the reclaimers. The true view, to my thinking, is that the two parts of the agreement are relative, and exist and cease together; and as it is admitted that one part does not apply to singular successors, neither does the rest.

3. The clause in the construction agreement titled "Lastly" strongly supports the same construction. (I agree with the reclaimers in thinking that the word "fourth" seems to have dropped out before the word "party"; but this does not much matter.) No warrandice, and no privilege in perpetuity, is given by the parties, but simply their respective consents to the formation of the tramway and its work and maintenance, and to its removal as provided in the agreement. On a full review of both agreements, I think that this is the intentional and deliberate restriction of the deeds to a personal agreement.

The argument to the contrary was plausible, but I think it is fallacious. The reason of the clause, it was said, was that, in the working agreement, the word "perpetuity" was used; and in framing the construction agreement the parties, adverting to this word, qualify it by pointing to the 8th article of the construction agreement as stating the condition under which the rule of perpetuity does not apply. Then it is said that the 8th article is inconsistent with the idea that one of the feuars could, of his own pleasure, remove the part of the tramway on his lands.

This last point is sound enough, but then it (and the whole argument) leave untouched the question, to whom does this system apply; and it then appears that "Lastly" simply negatives the word "perpetuity" as the true statement of the duration, and does nothing more, except leave the duration to be determined by the scope and terms of the agreement itself, which is declared not to contain any warrandice, but only the consent of the parties to the deed.

July 17, 1897.
Park Yard Co.,
Limited, v.
North British
Railway Co.

No. 203. The construction which I place upon the deed itself supersedes the question of the effect of knowledge on the part of the purchaser, which was argued on the relevancy of the reclaimers' averments.

July 17, 1897.
Park Yard Co.,
Limited, v.
North British
Railway Co.

An amendment of the record saved, and therefore removed from discussion, any claim the railway company may have to assert a public right of way. This being so, we have no occasion to consider whether the Lord Ordinary's opinion is tenable, that a railway company has no title to assert a public right of way.

I am for adhering.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—JAMES WATSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 204. ROBERT MACFIE, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Asher—Craigie.
CALLANDER AND OBAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Deas.

July 17, 1897.*
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, Defender.—Fleming.

Railway—Superfluous Lands—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 19), sec. 120.—A railway company which, under section 120 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, was bound to sell its superfluous lands before 16th July 1892, had at that date two small plots close to its terminal station, and used them partly as a private means of access to the station buildings, but principally as ornamental garden ground, improving the amenity of the station and its public accesses. These plots were the only ground available for any extension of the station or railway buildings. Prior to 16th July 1892 the directors had considered offers to buy parts of these plots, but had declined these offers on the ground that the price offered was too small. Subsequent to that date the directors remitted to their secretary and solicitor to conclude a sale of part of one plot to the Post-office, but they informed the directors that they had no power to sell, and the sale was not completed. Thereafter leases for five years, terminable at one year's notice, were granted by the railway company of two portions of the lands.

In 1896 the owner of lands adjoining, from whom the plots in question had been acquired by the railway company under their compulsory powers, brought an action for declarator that these plots were superfluous lands within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and that they therefore had vested in him on 16th July 1892. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Low) assolized the defenders, holding (1) that the actings of the directors did not bar the company from pleading that the lands were not superfluous; (2) that these actings were evidence, but not conclusive evidence, that the plots were superfluous; (3) that the question, whether the plots were superfluous, was to be determined by the circumstances as existing at 16th July 1892; and (4) that on the evidence as a whole the plots were not superfluous.

Observed that the question was, whether, if all the facts existing at the prescribed date had been known to a reasonably careful and skilful person, he would have said at that time, that the lands would by the ordinary development of the railway or neighbourhood be required to be actually applied to the purpose of the railway within a reasonable time, and that when pieces of land are small and close to a station, and in a town, it was more easily to be believed that they would be required. No. 204.

London and South-Western Railway v. Blackmore, 1870, L. R., 4 E. and I. App. 610, commented on. July 17, 1897. Macfie v. Callander and Oban Railway Co.

By the Callander and Oban Railway Acts, 1865 to 1878, the Callander and Oban Railway Company was incorporated and authorised to make, inter alia, certain works, including the terminal station, in the town of Oban, and to take lands compulsorily for these purposes. 1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

Among the lands thus taken in Oban were two plots of ground, designated in the action after mentioned as plots A and B, belonging to Mr Macfie of Airds.

The time limited for the completion of the works terminated on 16th July 1882.

On 11th March 1896 Mr Macfie raised an action against the Callander and Oban Railway Company, of which the leading conclusions were for declarator that the plots of ground marked A and B,—“ which plots are parts of the lands which were acquired by the defenders, the Callander and Oban Railway Company, for the purposes of their undertaking, as set forth in the Callander and Oban Railway Act, 1878—not having been required or used by the defenders the said Callander and Oban Railway Company for said purposes, and not being required for said purposes, have become superfluous lands within the meaning of section 120 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845: And (2) further ” for declarator that said plots of ground “ vested in and became the property of the pursuer as from and after 17th July 1892, or at least that they are now vested in and have become the property of the pursuer.” *

The Lord Advocate, as representing the Post-office (which had obtained a lease of part of plot A from the railway company), was also called as defender, but it is unnecessary to detail the conclusion so far as directed against his Lordship.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The plots of ground referred to in the summons not having been required or used by the defenders the Callander and Oban Railway Company for the purposes of their undertaking, and having thus become superfluous land within the meaning of the 120th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation

* The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 19), provides,—“ And with respect to lands acquired by the promoters of the undertaking under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, but which shall not be required for the purposes thereof, be it enacted as follows :—

“ 120. Within the prescribed period, or if no period be prescribed within ten years after the expiration of the time limited by the special Act for the completion of the works, the promoters of the undertaking shall absolutely sell and dispose of all such superfluous lands in such manner as they may deem most advantageous, and apply the purchase-money arising from such sales to the purposes of the special Act; and in default thereof all such superfluous lands remaining unsold at the expiration of such period shall thereupon vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining thereto, in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same.”

There was no “ prescribed period ” fixed by the Callander and Oban Railway Act, 1878, but the period for the completion of the works thereunder expired on 16th July 1882, and the ten years thereafter consequently expired on 16th July 1892.

No. 204. Act, 1845, the pursuer, as proprietor of the adjoining lands, is entitled to decree in terms of the first, second, and third conclusions of the summons.
 July 17, 1897.
 Macfie v.
 Callander and
 Oban Railway
 Co.

The Callander and Oban Railway Company pleaded, inter alia :—
 (5) The land being required by these defenders for the purpose of their undertaking, and having on that account been retained by them, is not superfluous land within the meaning of the statute. (6) The said lands not being superfluous lands within the meaning of the statute, the defender should be assoilized, with expenses.

A proof was led. It appeared from the evidence that the piece of ground of which plots A and B were parts had originally consisted of part of the bed of the sea and of the foreshore, and part of the bed and foreshore of the Black Lynn Burn, which had been acquired from the Board of Trade, and partly of rough ground immediately above the foreshore which had been acquired from the pursuer. By means of retaining walls the Callander and Oban Railway had levelled this up and had laid out on it an open space or place in front of the station suitable for omnibuses and other vehicles waiting the arrival of trains, and two roads as accesses to the town. There were left the two plots of which A measured 32 poles, and B 1 rood 19½ poles. These plots were fenced in, and were laid out with grass and shrubs as ornamental grounds. In addition, through plot A ran two roads, one of which served as access to the cellar under the station refreshment-room, and the other as access to the back part of the station.

Evidence was led that the station at Oban was barely sufficient for the traffic, especially in summer, and that it could not be extended except by using the plots; that the railway offices at Oban were very inconveniently situated, and that when the company could afford to provide new offices the natural place for them was on either of these plots, so as to be as near to the station as possible; and that the necessity for extension of the station would be enhanced by the increase of traffic arising from the opening up of new lines running into Oban.

It further appeared that on 19th October 1880 an offer was made to the Callander and Oban Railway Company on behalf of Mrs Campbell, the proprietrix of a hotel adjoining plot B, for the purchase of a part of that plot, and that the minute of the directors thereon was "Decline: Company does not desire to sell."

With reference to another offer by her for part of plot B, the directors, on 25th January 1887, minuted "Decline."

On 22d November 1889 the directors minuted "Read letter from D. M'Intosh, architect, Oban, dated 5th inst., inquiring as to what price the spare land at Argyle Square will be given, and report by the secretary thereon. The manager to inform Mrs Campbell that inquiries are being made for the vacant ground near the station, and ascertain whether, and for what quantity, she desires to acquire of it."

Further offers by Mrs Campbell, dated 19th September 1892, and 11th October 1892, were submitted, and the minute of the directors' meeting of 12th October 1892 bore,—"Decline. Price too low."

With regard to an offer by her of 19th August 1893, the directors instructed the preparation of a ground plan, and another offer, dated 19th September 1893, was submitted, but no action was taken thereon.

As regarded plot A, various proposals had been made to Mr Anderson, the manager and secretary of the Callander and Oban Railway, by shopkeepers in Oban, to build railway offices with a range of No. 204. shops underneath, and plans were submitted to him.

In the autumn of 1892 Mr Anderson instructed an architect to prepare sketch plans for plot A, and these included a post-office, shops, and offices or dwelling-houses. These plans had apparently been submitted to the directors, but no action was taken on them.

July 17, 1897.
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

In August 1892 inquiries were made by the Post-office authorities as to the purchase of part of plot A, and after a lengthy correspondence and delay in getting the sanction of the Treasury, they intimated on 9th December 1894 that they were prepared to negotiate for its purchase. On 20th December 1894 the directors minuted,—“The price altogether being £2350, remit to Mr Anderson and Mr Neave (the company’s solicitor) to endeavour to come to an arrangement at the price named.”

On 27th February 1895 a formal offer was made on behalf of the Post-office for the purchase of the part of plot A. On 18th March 1895 Mr Neave informed the Solicitor to the Post-office that “as the ground is not superfluous land, there will be some difficulty in the company conveying the ground to the Post-office,” and on 27th March that “the company are not in a position to sell.” The proposed sale was accordingly not carried through.

On 3d December 1895 the directors resolved to let to Mrs Campbell part of plot B, and to the Post-office another part of the same plot, the lease in both cases to be for five years certain, and thereafter at one year’s notice. Both these leases were completed.

On 3d March 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced the following interlocutor:—“The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, finds that the portion of the plot of ground marked A on the plan produced with the summons, which the directors of the Callander and Oban Railway Company agreed to sell to Her Majesty’s Post-master-General in the year 1895, and the plot of ground marked B on said plan, became superfluous lands within the meaning of section 120 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and vested in and became the property of the owner or owners of lands adjoining thereto from and after the 17th July 1892. . . .”

* “OPINION.—If the directors of the Callander and Oban Railway Company had not tried to sell the plots of land in question, but had all along dealt with them as if they were lands which the company required and intended to hold, I should have thought, although even then the question would have been attended with difficulty, that the pursuer could not succeed.

“The two plots of ground, which have been referred to as A and B, were parts of certain lands which the company, in the exercise of their compulsory powers, acquired from the pursuer. These lands lay between Argyle Place and Aird’s Place and the sea, and to a great extent, if not wholly, consisted of ground which had been roughly reclaimed from foreshore. The ground was bounded on the north by a stream called the Black Lynn. The company, at considerable expense, built a retaining-wall along the stream, and filled up the whole of the ground to one level. Across the centre of the ground they made a road leading from Argyle Square to the station. On each side of the road there was a triangular plot of ground—the plots in question—which they surrounded with walls and iron railings, and laid out with flowers and shrubs as ornamental ground. The two plots of ground together amount to very little over half an acre.

“There is no doubt that by so dealing with the plots of ground the com-

No. 204. The Callander and Oban Railway Company reclaimed, and argued; —The lands had been occupied and used by the railway during the whole of the ten years, and were thus not superfluous. The onus was on the pursuer to shew that they were superfluous.¹ Lands might become "superfluous" in four different ways.² The lands in question did not fall under any of the divisions. The pursuer's claim seemed to be that he could arrange the station and accesses so that part of the lands would not be required, and that he was thus entitled to that part. But in taking lands the railway officials were the sole judges of what was necessary for the undertaking, if acting bona fide,³ and in this case the evidence shewed that they took what they considered necessary for providing proper access to the station. The small parts not actually used for public access were used for private access and for enhancing the amenity of the station. Such a use had never been held insufficient to prevent the lands becoming superfluous. Cases where lands had been held superfluous were cases where, as in May's case,² the purpose for which they were taken was exhausted, or where there never was any use,⁴ or where no use was pany made the approach to their station much more sightly and attractive than it would have been if the plots had been covered with buildings, or left in the rough state in which they were when the company acquired them. It was said, however, that such a use of the ground was not one of the purposes authorised by the company's Act, and that the plots are therefore in the same position as regards the present question as if they had lain waste. Now, there are no statutory limits or requirements as to the size or style of railway stations, and if a railway company thinks it advisable to spend money upon what is merely ornamental, that is a matter between them and their shareholders. Therefore I am not prepared to assent to the view that to lay out a small piece of ground as ornamental ground in front of an important station is necessarily so beyond the powers of a railway company that they are liable to forfeit the ground so laid out at the end of ten years if they cannot shew that they require it for strictly railway purposes. I think that is a question of circumstances. If a small piece of ornamental ground formed part of a scheme for making a station attractive and convenient, I think that the Court would be very slow to hold the ground to be superfluous. If, on the other hand, it appeared that the ground had been laid out merely as a temporary expedient to prevent unsightliness, until a good opportunity arose of disposing of it, or until it should be required for other purposes, I do not think that the fact that the company had expended money upon the ground would prevent it falling into the category of superfluous.

"In the present case, however, I think that there are strong grounds for believing that the two plots were never designed to be kept permanently as ornamental ground. Although small in extent, they are very valuable, being apparently worth from four to five thousand pounds. It is most unlikely that the directors of a railway company, which never seems to have

¹ Moon's Trustees v. North British Railway Co., Feb. 8, 1879, 6 R. 640; Hooper v. Bourne, 1880, L. R., 5 App. Cas. 1.

² Great Western Railway Co. v. May, 1874, L. R., 7 E. and I. App. 283, at p. 292.

³ Stockton and Darlington Railway Co. v. Brown, 1860, 9 Cl. H. L. Ca. 246; City of Glasgow Union Railway Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., July 22, 1871, 9 Macph. (H. L.) 115, 43 Scot. Jur. 429.

⁴ Norton v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 1879, L. R., 13 Ch. Div. 268.

possible without further powers being obtained by the railway.¹ No. 204. Further, the position of the lands claimed affected the question. There was a presumption against treating them as superfluous if they were of small extent, or situated near a station or a populous and increasing town.² The 16th July 1892 was the punctum temporis at which it was to be found whether or not the lands were superfluous,³ and in this inquiry the Court might take into consideration as evidence facts occurring subsequently. But the mere fact of temporary leases of the lands was not enough.² On this question the Lord Ordinary was against the pursuer, and his view was amply borne out by the evidence, which shewed not only that there was actual possession and use by the railway at the date mentioned, but a reasonable probability of further use for extension of station buildings and railway offices. But he had held that the railway was barred by the actings of its directors subsequent to 16th July 1892 from pleading that the lands were not superfluous at that date. These actings merely amounted to entertaining proposals for a sale of part of plot A. The sale was never completed, and thus this case was very different from the cases

July 17, 1897.
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

been overburdened with funds, should have dedicated such valuable ground to such a use. The presumption seems to me to be that the directors laid out the plots as they did until the ground could be otherwise used or disposed of, and that view is, as I shall shew, entirely consistent with the actings of the directors.

"But (apart from the actings of the directors) there is a great deal to be said for the view that the plots are not superfluous, because there is a reasonable prospect of their being required for railway works.

"If an extension of the station is required, the company have no ground which could be made available except these two plots. It was said by several witnesses of great skill and experience that the station accommodation is ample, and that there is no prospect of any more being required. I think, however, that the balance of the evidence is, upon the whole, the other way. The traffic has largely increased, and is increasing; and the probability is, that owing to the opening of new lines it will continue to increase in the future.

"I think that a terminal station upon a line upon which the traffic is increasing, and upon which there is already a large passenger traffic in summer, cannot be regarded as well equipped when it has only one refreshment-room and one room for both left luggage and parcels, and no office—except a booking-office—for any official. I therefore think that the necessity for increased station accommodation is likely to arise, although within what period it is impossible to foretell; and, as I have said, the plots in question are the only ground available.

"Further, the defenders founded strongly on the fact that plot A is not wholly used as pleasure-ground. It is crossed by a road, one branch of which leads to the cellar under the refreshment-rooms and another branch to the back of the station. These accesses are of the nature of proper railway works, and accordingly the defenders contended that the plot of ground upon which they are placed could not be regarded as superfluous. It is plain, however, that the defenders would not have acquired the whole of plot A for the purpose of making an access to the cellar and the back

Stewart v. Highland Railway Co., March 8, 1889, 16 R. 580.

² Betts v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 1878, L. R., 3 Ex. Div. 182; Moon's Trustees and Hooper, cit. supra, p. 1160, note 1.

³ Great Western Railway Co. v. May, L. R., 7 Eng. and Ir. App. 283, at pp. 295-7.

No. 204. July 17, 1897. Macfie v. Callander and Oban Railway Co. relied on by the pursuer, where there was either actual sale or exposure in open market as "superfluous lands."¹ Even when there was a completed sale that was not conclusive, for the sale might be either a fraud or ultra vires.² Here there was no completed sale, nor any decision by the directors that the lands were superfluous, but merely a lease to the Post-office authorities, whom the railway were entitled to make special provision for as being large customers.³

Argued for the pursuer;—The theory of the Railway Acts was that railways took what they considered necessary for their purpose. But once the land was taken the right accrued to the person from whom it was taken to watch the use made of it. In this case the railway at their own hand chose the position of the station and the accesses thereto. These accesses and station were sufficient up to 16th July 1892, and the remainder was not required. Probable additional requirements in consequence of other lines being made did not affect the question, for these were not "the undertaking" for which the land was taken, and for which it might be held. There was no case to support the taking of ground for pure ornamentation and retaining it for that purpose alone. The question then was, was the conduct of the railway officials such as to shew a bona fide intention to

of the station. A road along the station wall would have been equally convenient; and I imagine that the road was placed where it is simply because the defenders had no particular use for plot A, and by taking the road round one side of it they were able to lay out the plot more tastefully. The strong point for the defenders in regard to plot A is, that it immediately adjoins the railway station, and is the ground upon which any extension of the station must be built.

"If, therefore, it had not been for the actings of the directors in regard to the ground (I refer to both plots), I should, upon the whole, have been of opinion it was not superfluous on account of the reasonable probability which appears to me to exist of its being required for the extension of the station.

"Unfortunately, however, the directors have dealt with the ground in a way which is inconsistent, in my judgment, with any other supposition than that, in their opinion, it was superfluous.

"The time limited by the company's special Act for the completion of their works expired in July 1882, and they had ten years from that date within which to sell superfluous lands. The question of disposing of the ground does not appear to have been brought prominently before the directors until about 1886. From that time forward, however, it was repeatedly the subject of consideration at board meetings.

"A great deal was said about reports which Mr Anderson, the secretary, made to the directors in regard to the value of the ground, and plans which he had prepared, shewing how it could be best utilised. Now I do not think that the fact that the directors discussed the question of disposing of the ground, and made inquiries as to its value, is in itself of much importance. The question whether lands are or are not superfluous must often be a delicate one for a railway company, and I think that it is quite reasonable use the land for railway purposes within a reasonable¹ time? Here No. 204. it was not. Mr Anderson repeatedly submitted to his directors proposals to sell part of these lands, and these proposals were only declined because the price was too low. When a sufficient price was offered by the Post-office, the directors at once accepted the proposal so far as they could. *Blackmore's*² case was on all-fours. That decided that offering lands for sale acted as estoppel in cases where the neighbouring proprietor had right of pre-emption. This was a case where the right was of property, but the principle was the same. Both were rights of restraint on the possession of the railway.

¹ Moody v. Corbett, 1886, L. R., 1 Q. B. 510, 1865, 34 L. J., Q. B. 166, at p. 172; London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Blackmore, 1870, L. R., 4 E. and L. App. 610.

² Carington v. Wycombe Railway Co., 1868, L. R., 3 Ch. Ap. 377; Hobbs v. Midland Railway Co., 1882, L. R., 20 Ch. Div. 418; Beauchamp v. Great Western Railway Co., 1868, L. R., 3 Ch. Ap. 745; Dunhill v. North-Eastern Railway Co., L. R. [1896], 1 Ch. 121.

³ Betts v. Great Eastern Railway Co., L. R., 3 Excheq. Div. 182.

July 17, 1897.
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer's claim, as stated in the summons, is that, from 17th July 1892, the two pieces of ground in dispute vested in him; and the question at issue is whether, at that date, they were superfluous lands in the sense of the statutes. The summons purports to claim a declarator that, even if the lands did not become the property of the pur-for the directors in considering it to ascertain what price they could get for the lands if they came to be of opinion that they could do without them and resolved to sell them.

"But, in this case, the directors went far beyond getting information as to the value of the lands and the chances of the market. They dealt with actual offers. They actually concluded a contract for the sale of a large part of plot A, and they only did not do so as regarded plot B because the price offered did not satisfy them; and there is no suggestion in the minutes or correspondence that they ever had any doubt as to their power to sell the ground, or as to the advisability of doing so, provided they could get a sufficient price.

"Plot B is separated from the Station Hotel only by the Black Lynn Burn, and Mrs Campbell, the proprietrix, was anxious to acquire that plot, chiefly because she wished to cover over the burn, which she considered to be prejudicial to the hotel. She accordingly made repeated offers to purchase the ground, and it is plain that her offers were refused for no other reason than that the directors did not consider the price which she offered high enough. Mr Brown, the only member of the Callander and Oban board who was examined, said that even if Mrs Campbell had offered a sufficient price, the directors would not have agreed to sell to her until they had consulted their engineer as to whether or not the ground was required for railway purposes. I think that Mr Brown's recollection must be at fault upon the point. In the first place, there is no indication in the minutes or the correspondence that the directors considered it to be necessary to consult anyone as to whether or not (apart from the question of price) it was prudent to sell the ground. On the contrary, the plain inference to be drawn from the documentary evidence is that the only thing which stood in the way of a sale to Mrs Campbell was the price. In the second place, when the Post-office authorities offered for a portion of plot A what the directors considered to be a sufficient price, an agreement of sale was concluded without the engineer or anyone else being called in to advise the directors.

"The Post-office authorities first opened negotiations for the acquisition of ground for a new post-office in July 1892. The matter was brought before the directors at a meeting held upon the 10th August 1892, and the minute bears that the secretary was authorised to state 'that a certain por-

¹ Great Western Railway Co. v. May, L. R., 7 Eng. and Ir. App. 283.

² London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Blackmore, L. R., 4 Eng. and Ir. App. 610.

No. 204. July 17, 1897. Macfie v. Callander and Oban Railway Co. suer at 17th July 1892, at least they are now vested in him, and have become his property. No plea is stated on record, or has been stated in argument, in support of any theory according to which the lands, if they were not vested in the pursuer at 17th July 1892, became vested in him at some later date. The sequel will shew that this observation is not unimportant. If the lands were superfluous at 17th July 1892, they vested in the pursuer; if at that date they were not superfluous, then the pursuer has no right to them.

It may be convenient to consider, first, the condition and actual uses of the ground in July 1892, apart from their potential uses and the uses which have been projected for them. But the history of the ground bears upon both subjects.

The terminus of the Callander and Oban line, at Oban, is situated close to the sea, and the land taken from the pursuer is the northmost or terminal part of the lands taken under their compulsory powers. The lands taken were not, however, ready to hand for the uses to which they have been tion of the ground at Argyle Square can be sold, and the directors will consider proposals for its purchase.' That was a very plain indication of the directors' opinion that a portion, at all events, of the ground in question was superfluous, because it was only upon the assumption that it was superfluous that it could be sold. The Post-office authorities subsequently proposed that, instead of their purchasing a piece of ground, the company should build a post-office, which they (the postal authorities) should take on lease. That proposal was declined, but by letter of 7th September 1893 the secretary, Mr Anderson, intimated that the company 'are willing to sell land for this purpose.' Finally, in the end of 1894, the Post-office authorities offered a sum of £2350 for a portion of plot A. After some correspondence, that offer was in March 1895 approved of by the directors, and they remitted to the secretary and the solicitor 'to take the necessary steps for sale of ground.'

"The sale of the ground was not in fact carried out, because Mr Neave, the solicitor of the company, advised that they could not give a good title. Mr Neave was not examined as a witness, and the letters which he wrote upon the subject are very guarded; and the impression which they convey to my mind is, that they do not disclose his full reasons for advising that the company could not give a title. He simply says that the lands are not superfluous lands, and that therefore the company could not sell them. No doubt he noticed that the ten years during which it was competent for the company to sell superfluous lands had expired before the agreement with the Post-office was made.

"What then is the result, as regards the present question, of the directors having agreed to sell a portion of plot A to the Post-office, and negotiated for the sale of plot B?

"The directors are the proper persons, in the first instance, to decide whether lands are or are not superfluous, and they have the best means of judging as to what is required for the purposes of the railway. And when it is proved that they have deliberately acted in a way which shewed that their opinion was that the lands were not required, I think that the onus is shifted. It is then for the directors to shew that the lands never were superfluous, and to explain their previous actings and reconcile them with the position which they now take up.

"It seems to me that in a question with the Callander and Oban Railway Company, the decision of the House of Lords in the London and South-Western Railway Company v. Blackmore (4 E. & I. App. p. 610) is in applied. They consisted of rough ground, with the tide, at least in the part now in question, coming through the stones. The company made up the ground, and used it, when so transformed, for their station. The land taken from the pursuer was accordingly used in part for the station buildings, and in part for the approaches to the station. In front of the station, there was formed an open place. Instead of making the eastern approach to the station as wide as this place, the company made it a good deal narrower, leaving on either side the pieces of ground now in dispute. Of these the one A is less than, and the other B is over, a quarter of an acre. A is directly contiguous to the station building, and B is separated from A by the breadth of the roadway. Both A and B were laid out as ornamental grounds, with accesses and broad footpaths. In the case of A, two of those footroads, forming what the pursuer's leading witness calls a very considerable part of the area, furnish access to the south-east portion of the station, and the wine or beer cellar of the refreshment-room. Those roads have been in use by the company for the purposes of the station since

No. 204.

July 17, 1897.
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

point. There a railway company had, during the currency of the ten years, sold certain lands. These lands not being in town, or building lands, or built upon, an adjoining proprietor had a right of pre-emption. In an action at the instance of the adjoining owner, the sale was set aside, and it was held that his right of pre-emption had arisen,—the contention of the company, that the sale being set aside they were entitled to continue to hold the lands until the expiry of the ten years, as if the sale had never been made, being repelled.

“Lord Westbury, after saying that the sale must be set aside, put the point thus:—‘But then the question arose, Were the directors to be remitted to their former position, and placed in a capacity to determine what to do with these lands as if they had never proceeded to deal with them as superfluous lands? That is a question which, at first sight, appeared to me to deserve much consideration; but undoubtedly in the cases referred to, it has been held, and I am by no means inclined to disagree with the decision, that the act of the directors in putting up the lands for sale stamps the lands absolutely with the character of superfluous lands, and that the directors are estopped from denying that they have that character under the Act of Parliament.’

“Now, if an attempted sale of lands during the currency of the ten years stamps them with the character of superfluous lands and at once gives rise to the right of pre-emption, an attempt to sell at the end of ten years, after the directors have had the full period allowed by statute to consider whether the lands are or are not required for the purposes of the special Act, must also do so.

“If the directors had been able to give any explanation of their actings in regard to the ground, which shewed that these actings were not inconsistent with the position which they now take up, I have no doubt that they would have done so. But no satisfactory explanation has been forthcoming. Mr Anderson, the secretary, who prepared numerous reports upon the subject, and conducted the correspondence, was not examined. I think, however, that it is plain from the documentary evidence that his opinion all along was that the ground was not required by the company and should be sold. Mr Bolton, the chairman of the company, was said to be too ill to attend the proof, but it was not said that he could not be examined on commission. The only individual who had anything to do with the proceedings who was examined was Mr Brown, and I do not consider that the explanations which he gives are satisfactory. He says, in the first place,

No. 204. the grounds were laid out. Accordingly, at 17th July 1892, the condition of matters was this—both areas formed ornamental grounds, and A was further used, to the extent of its roadways, for access to the station. Those were not, of course, principal accesses, or used for other than subordinate purposes, but they were in fact accesses.

July 17, 1897.
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

I now inquire what were the potential uses of those lands to the Railway Company; and, of course, I disregard what is imaginary, or conjectural, or remote. We are to put ourselves in the position of business men looking around them in July 1892, with a view not too sanguine and not too borné. Can we say “that, if all the facts existing on the last day of the ten years had been known to a reasonably skilful and careful person, he would have said, at that time, that the lands in question would, by the ordinary development of the railway or neighbourhood, be required to be actually applied to the purpose of the railway within a reasonable time”?¹

that the company were willing to sell to the Post-office, although they would not have sold to a private individual. I do not think that Mr Brown has any distinct recollection of what passed at the meetings, and the documentary evidence leads me to conclude that the directors would have sold as readily to a private person as to the Post-office if the former had offered as good a price. Further, a desire to favour the Post-office as being a branch of the public service is really beside the question, because the directors could not sell one foot of ground to the Post-office or anyone else unless it was ground which was not required for the purposes of the special Act,—that is to say, superfluous ground. Mr Brown says, in the next place, that the directors never applied their minds to the question whether plot B was ground which they ought to sell or not, because they never had an offer at a price which was worth considering. Now, unless the directors were prepared to sell to Mrs Campbell, if she offered them a sufficient price, they treated her in a way which it is impossible to justify. In the first place, they undoubtedly gave her to understand that the only reason for declining her offer was deficiency in the price. In the second place, at their meeting of 22d November 1889 they instructed the secretary ‘to inform Mrs Campbell that inquiries are being made for the vacant ground near the station, and ascertain whether, and for what quantity, she desires to acquire it.’ That was inviting her to offer for the ground. In the third place, they allowed Mrs Campbell’s agent, by arrangement with the secretary, to travel to Glasgow on three different occasions to have a personal interview with them on the subject. It seems to me to be impossible to believe that the directors would have acted in that way unless they had been prepared to sell the ground to Mrs Campbell, if she came up to their views of an adequate price.

“I have therefore come to the conclusion, although with regret, that so far as the Callander and Oban Company is concerned, the directors, by agreeing to sell part of plot A to the Post-office, stamped the portion which they so agreed to sell with the character of superfluous lands. In regard to plot B, although the actings of the directors are not perhaps so unequivocal as in regard to plot A, there are much stronger grounds (apart from the actings of the directors) for holding the former to be superfluous land than the latter. Practically the only use to which it has been suggested that plot B could be put, is that if the station was extended over plot A, it might be necessary to shift the road from Argyle Square on to plot B. If, therefore, plot A must be regarded as superfluous land, I think that it necessarily

¹ Hooper v. Bourne, 1880, L. R., 5 App. Cas. 1, Lord O’Hagan at p. 18, quoting Lord Justice Brett in same case, 1877, 3 Q. B. D. 258, at p. 282.

I do not think it necessary to elaborate this point, because the Lord Ordinary has indicated that, apart from the actings of the company themselves, he would hold that there was a reasonable probability of the ground being required for the extension of the station. In this opinion, I concur. But, as the effect to be given to the actings of the company may depend on the degree of strength of the evidence that the lands would, in reasonable probability, be needed for the active purposes of the company, I shall dwell on it for a moment.

It is obvious to remark, and has frequently been remarked, that, where pieces of land are small, and close to a station, and in a town, it is the more easily to be believed that they are "required." The patent facts about Oban, and about this railway, render these general considerations applicable with more, rather than less, than the average force. Further, it is proved that, if the station or its accesses were ever to be enlarged by a foot, this ground is the only resource which the company has to draw on; and it is directly available for those purposes. Should such needs arise, then, on the assumption of the pursuer's success, this land would have to be bought back again. That such needs are likely to arise requires but little enforcement. The existing establishment was originally planned in accordance with the limited financial ability of the company at the time, and is in several respects contracted; there is adequate evidence that, for goods and parcel traffic, for refreshment-rooms, and for offices, the present arrangements are already insufficient, if regard be had to present comfort, and the expansion of traffic.

Up to this point, what I have said is entirely in accordance with the opinion of the Lord Ordinary; and the next question is, why has the Lord Ordinary come to the conclusion that the greater part of these lands were superfluous at 17th July 1892? The answer to this question of fact must be, because, and only because, of the actings of the directors.

follows that plot B must also be so, and I can find no ground for distinguishing between different parts of plot B.

"In regard to the portion of plot A other than that which the directors agreed to sell to the Post-office, there is more difficulty. It is to be observed in the first place that the pursuer now recognises that he cannot claim the whole of plot A, and he has restricted his claim so as to leave a free entry from the north to the strip of ground, thirteen feet in width, running along the wall of the station to form an access to the cellar and the back of the station, in lieu of the roads which now run round plot A. Now, I do not think that it is proved that the directors ever contemplated selling the whole of plot A. On the contrary I think that there are indications that they did not do so. Thus the minute of the directors' meeting of 10th August 1892 (when the Post-office first approached them) runs thus:—'Mr Anderson authorised to state that a certain portion of the ground at Argyle Square can be sold.' Further, the directors never had any offer before them for the purchase of the remainder of plot A, and they never intimated to anyone that they were willing to sell that ground, and although plans were prepared shewing buildings covering the whole of plot A, these buildings included railway offices. Therefore, I am of opinion that the defenders are not estopped by their actings from pleading that the portion of plot A not included in the sale to the Post-office was not at the end of ten years superfluous, and as it is the only ground available for building an office, or a second refreshment-room, or a parcels office, and is quite suitable for these purposes, I think, for the reasons which I have already stated, that I am justified in holding that it was not as matter of fact superfluous. . . ."

No. 204.

July 17, 1897.
 Macfie v.
 Callander and
 Oban Railway
 Co.

No. 204. I shall state briefly, and the matter admits of brevity, what I hold to be the facts as to the company's actings. Some of the propositions are negative; but these are not the least important.

July 17, 1897.
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

1. The directors never considered before, at, or after July 1892, of what use the lands in question were, or were likely to become, to the company.

2. The directors never came to any general resolution to sell "A" and "B," or either of them. They only considered certain proposals for the sale of certain parts of them.

3. In regard to "A," the directors did not, within the ten years, either resolve to sell, or consider any proposal for the sale of any part of "A."

The only step taken in the direction of selling any part of "A" was after the expiry of the ten years, to wit, in August 1892, when the secretary was authorised to state to the Post-office that a certain portion of "A" would be sold, the negotiations being continued till 1895, when the directors remitted to the secretary and solicitor to take the necessary steps for selling to the Post-office the ground specified in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. There was no concluded contract of sale, and the proposal was abandoned.

4. In regard to "B," the directors did, within the ten years, consider various proposals by Mrs Campbell for the sale to her of parts of "B." Those proposals were, in each instance, declined on the ground of the proposed price being too small.

5. No part of "B" was in fact ever sold; and none was let until 1895, when, after the falling through of the proposal for a sale of part of "A," a certain portion of "B" was let to the Post-office for five years, and another portion of "B" was let to Mrs Campbell for the same period.

6. The pursuer has proved as part of his case that in 1892 a plan was prepared at the instance of the company's officers for utilising part of "A" for offices for the company, provision being made in part of the building for shops, which might apparently be let.

It is manifest from what has now been stated that the conduct of the executive of the defenders, to a certain extent, supports the contention of the pursuer. The actings of the directors, and the absence from the witness-box of several of the officers of the company who took part in those proceedings, have furnished the pursuer's counsel with material for legitimate comment. But it is necessary to see precisely what is the legal result of this conduct. Do the actings of the directors constitute a bar against the company now asserting the lands not to have been superfluous at 17th July 1892? or do they merely constitute evidence, more or less cogent, that the lands were in fact superfluous? Those two things are essentially different; but they meet, and I think are in danger of being confused, in a metaphor much used in the discussion,—it is said that the company have stamped the lands as superfluous. (This phrase has come from an opinion of Lord Westbury's, in which it is used with precision as relative to estoppel.)

Now, it cannot be disputed that the fact, e.g., that directors within the ten years resolved to sell, and only did not sell because the price was too small, is prima facie cogent evidence that the land so dealt with was not required for the company's purposes. The reason for the inference is that the duty of directors being only to sell what is not required, it is to be presumed that, before resolving to sell, they had considered whether or not the land was required for the company's purposes, and had concluded that it was not. I say such a fact is cogent evidence, but it is not conclusive, and cannot possibly be so. Suppose that directors, tempted by a large price, resolved to sell the platform of a station, or a siding in daily use, the proper inference from the resolution would be, not that the lands were superfluous, but that the directors had not known, or had not attended to, the legal limitations on their power to dispose of the company's property. Again, suppose the case to be less gross than that of a platform or a siding—the case of land about which opinion might be divided as to whether it was or was not required—that the directors had resolved to sell, but that it appeared that they had so resolved in ignorance of the law which enables them to sell what is superfluous, but forbids them to sell what is required. In that case the cogency of the resolution to sell, as evidence of superfluity, is largely abated. It would merely come to this, that the directors thought that the money was more required by the company than the land. It would not prove that they thought that the company did not require the land. It is necessary here, and throughout the discussion, to beware of misusing the word “required.” The question is not whether it would not be possible to get on without the lands, or whether, by reconstructing your station, you might not so economise your ground as to leave this bit over.

No. 204.

July 17, 1897.

Macfie v.

Callander and

Oban Railway
Co.

Now, as I have pointed out, in my summary of the evidence, the directors of the defenders' company did not consider the questions properly arising when a sale of the company's lands is proposed. Their proceedings shew clearly that they did not consider whether the land was or was not required, and shew also that they acted exactly in the same way after as during the ten years, although, after the ten years, they had no power to sell, the theory of the statutes being, that after the ten years all that remains in the company is “required.” In short, I think it is abundantly plain that they did not advert to the facts (and were never reminded or told) that directors can only sell land not required for the company's purposes, and that they cannot sell at all after the ten years. There is a very significant letter, dated 31st August 1893, from the secretary to the chairman, from which it appears that the law about superfluous lands was only unearthed after the ten years were out, and that on this occasion the wrong section was supposed to apply. All the testimony harmonises with this view, although, for reasons easily conjectured, it does not directly affirm it.

If, then, the actings of the directors be merely evidence on the question of fact, whether the lands were required or not, I hold that no legitimate inference can be drawn that the opinion of those persons was that the lands in question, if retained by the company, would not be required to be actually applied to the purpose of the railway within a reasonable time. If no such inference arises, then the conduct under consideration does not as evidence affect the question at issue. Even if, contrary to my opinion, an inference of opinion on the part of those persons that the lands were not required did arise, then I prefer the testimony of the very capable men who have given in the witness-box their opinions (and the reasons of those opinions) that the lands were required. And in regard to those parts of

No. 204. "A" which were and are actually used as accesses to the station, I prefer the facts to any opinions proved or inferred.

July 17, 1897.
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

There remains the question whether the actings of the directors bar the company from maintaining that the lands are not superfluous. The way in which the question arises can best be seen by taking "A" and "B" one by one, for the facts are different.

As regards "A," the Lord Ordinary proceeds solely on the abortive resolution to sell part of "A" to the Post-office in 1895. I think it quite clear, from several passages in his Lordship's opinion, that he treats the transaction as a bar, and not merely as evidence of superfluity. His theory leads to a very singular result, for he holds to be superfluous that part of "A" which was and is in actual use as an access to the station, while he allows the company to retain a large part of what was only used as ornamental ground, and his grounds for so distinguishing are that, as regards the latter, the company "are not estopped by their actings from pleading that the portion of 'A' not included in the sale to the Post-office was not at the end of the ten years superfluous," and that that ground is available for an office or a second refreshment-room. It is most remarkable that the pursuer has acquiesced in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. He is therefore acquiescent in the view that about one-half of "A" is not superfluous. Now, when an area of less than a quarter of an acre is reduced by one-half, and it appears that of the remaining fraction a large part is admittedly in use for access, the argument becomes pretty thin.

There seems to me to be at least two fatal objections to the theory of bar as regards "A." The one is that the resolution to sell was come to after the expiry of the ten years, and the other is that no sale was made.

1. The law, as I understand it, is that, at the end of the ten years, i.e. on 17th July 1892, the lands either vested or did not vest in the adjoining proprietor. If, at that date, the lands were not required by the company, they vested in the pursuer; if they were required, then they did not vest in him, and his interest in them for ever came to an end. Of course, on the question of fact, light may be got from the sequel of events, and therefore what was done in 1895 may throw light on the state of things in 1892. But the hypothesis of the present question is that, taking all evidence into account, the lands were "required" in 1892, and the argument is that the company are barred, in a question with the pursuer, from pleading the fact. To my thinking, that hypothesis involves that in 1895 the pursuer had no right which could be affected by anything which the company could do, and that the actings of the company could not revive a right which from 17th July 1892 was dead and done with. The argument would be exactly the same if the abortive resolution to sell had been in 1995 instead of 1895, only that in that case the unsoundness of the pursuer's plea would be more open and palpable.

2. The second point to which I call attention is, that the resolution to sell was departed from, and no sale took place. In his interlocutor, the Lord Ordinary uses the words "which the directors agreed to sell" to the Postmaster-General; but it must be observed that no contract of sale was concluded with the Postmaster-General, no acceptance of his offer having been sent. The fact was that the directors, having instructed their officers to carry out the sale, were told by these officers that the sale could not go on, and it was no further proceeded with. No. 204.

Now, I cannot hold that the mere private fact that directors resolve to sell, although they immediately after abandon or rescind their resolution, can bar them from saying and proving that the lands were required. Suppose the directors were told by one of their local officials that they ought to sell the lands, and, too readily accepting his advice, remitted to their officers to carry out the sale, and then were told by return of post by the head engineer that this would never do, that they would require the lands next year, and the idea of sale is abandoned. The pursuer's contention involves that the ill-advised resolution is final in a question with the adjoining proprietor, although he never heard of it till after he claimed the lands. Such a theory seems to me entirely unsupported by principle.

July 17, 1897.
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

The Lord Ordinary seems to have been much influenced by the case of London and South-Western Railway Company v. Blackmore,¹ and indeed he has really decided the case in consequence of certain remarks of Lord Westbury in that case. Now, it has to be observed (1) that on the facts *Blackmore's*¹ case was the case of a sale, and not of a projected or contemplated sale; (2) that the claim was by a person having a right of pre-emption under what, in the English Act, is sec. 127 (and in the Scotch Act, sec. 121); (3) that it was the case of a sale within, and not after, the ten years; (4) while Lord Westbury speaks of the act of the directors in putting up the lands for sale as stamping the lands with the character of superfluous lands and estopping the directors, he says that this had been decided, and expresses his own personal opinion merely by saying that he is by no means inclined to disagree with the decision. We were told, and I suppose accurately, that the decisions referred to were *Lord Carington's*² case and *Lord Beauchamp's*³ case. If Lord Cairns's judgment in *Carington's*² case be referred to, it will be found that he rests his conclusion on the fact that the company had not still retained possession of the land, but had sold it to another. In *Lord Beauchamp's*³ case the judgment on this point is rested on the authority of Rangeley v. Midland Railway Company,⁴ and I am unable to find in the report of that decision anything which bears upon the present question. I am not prepared, therefore, upon the somewhat indirect and inconclusive authority which I have stated, to give effect to a plea which seems to me unsupported by the principles of our law of bar.

The case relating to "B" may be more briefly discussed. As already stated, what occurred within the ten years was merely the consideration and ultimate rejection of offers to purchase. As regards these, in my view they enter the question only as items of evidence, and the observations apply which have already been made in relation to "A." The leases given in 1895 to the Post-office and Mrs Campbell can hardly be regarded as inconsistent, by reason of their duration, with the view that ultimately, and at no distant time, the lands will be required for railway buildings. The temporary use in each case is appropriate to the general idea of railway

¹ L. R., 4 E and I. Ap. 610.

² L. R., 3 Ch. Ap. 745.

³ L. R., 3 Ch. Ap. 377.

⁴ L. R., 3 Ch. Ap. 306.

No. 204. interests being continuously furthered, for it cannot be doubted that the convenience of the Post-office is to a certain extent the convenience of the railway, while Mrs Campbell's possession of the rest of the area as garden ground ensures the continuance of the embellishment of the station.

July 17, 1897.
Macfie v.
Callander and
Oban Railway
Co.

My opinion upon the whole matter is that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defenders.

FINLAY & WILSON, S.S.C.—HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—JOHN S. PITMAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 205. MARY ANN CONNOLLY AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—A. S. D. Thomson.
THE BENT COLLIERY COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders.—Salvesen.

July 20, 1897.
Connolly v.
Bent Colliery
Co., Limited.

Minor and Pupil—Discharge of debtors of pupils—Factor loco tutoris.—Pupil children, whose parents were dead, having become entitled to a sum in settlement of an action of damages, moved the Court to appoint a person to receive the money and discharge the debtors. The Court, on the objection of the debtors, declined to make the appointment craved, on the ground that the debtors were entitled to an effectual discharge, and that a factor loco tutoris was the proper person to grant such a discharge.

2D DIVISION.

IN February 1897 Mary Ann Connolly and others, the pupil children of James Connolly, miner, Bothwell, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Bent Colliery Company Limited, for damages on account of the death of their father, who was killed when in the employment of the defenders.

The pursuers (whose mother was dead and to whom a tutor ad litem had been appointed), appealed for jury trial.

The action having been settled extrajudicially, the pursuers lodged a note craving the Court to ordain the defenders to make payment of the sum agreed to be paid in settlement of the pursuers' claims to such person at Glasgow as the Court might appoint to receive the same, and to authorise such person to grant a discharge therefor to the defenders.

The defenders objected, on the ground that the course proposed was incompetent, and that the proper course was to obtain the appointment of a factor loco tutoris, which could be done in the Sheriff Court.¹

The Court refused the note, on the ground that the defenders being entitled to an effectual discharge a factor loco tutoris was the proper person to grant the discharge, Lord Young observing that the appointment craved was virtually the creation of a trust.

GEORGE INGLIS & ORR, S.S.C.—W. G. L. WINCHESTER, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Authorities cited.—Pratt v. KNOX, June 28, 1855, 17 D. 1006; Anderson v. Muirhead, June 4, 1884, 11 R. 870; Sharp v. Pathhead Spinning Co., Jan. 30, 1885, 12 R. 574.

HENRY THOMSON & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Balfour
—Salvesen.

No. 206.

DANIEL DAILLY, Defender (Respondent).—Jameson—Kennedy.

July 20, 1897.*
Thomson &
Co. v. Dailly.

Reparation—Infringement of trade name—Measure of damages—Necessity for proving specific damage—Whether cost of detecting infringement an item of damage—Tender—Expenses.—Henry Thomson & Company, a firm of wholesale whisky merchants, brought an action against a public-house keeper for interdict against the defender selling whisky as of the pursuers' manufacture or blending which was not of their manufacture or blending, and for £500 as damages on account of such sales. The defender admitted that the pursuers were entitled to interdict, but he maintained that he was liable in nominal damages only, in respect that the pursuers had not proved special damage.

The defender deponed,—“I discouraged Henry Thomson's business as much as possible, for the simple reason that I had more profit by the other whiskies”; and the Court were of opinion that it was proved that he had fraudulently sold whisky which was not the pursuers' under the pursuers' name in order to discourage the sale of their whisky. There was no evidence that, after the defender's tenancy of his public-house commenced, the total sale of the pursuers' whisky had diminished in the town in which the public-house was situated.

Held (altering the judgment of Lord Pearson, Ordinary, who had awarded £10) that the fair inference was that the defender's fraudulent conduct had produced the result which it was intended to produce of substantially injuring the pursuers' trade, and that in the circumstances the damages fell to be assessed at £100.

Question, whether in estimating the amount of damages caused to a wholesale manufacturer by fraudulently retailing articles as of his manufacture which were not manufactured by him, the expenses incurred by him in detecting the fraud fell to be taken into account.

Question, whether the tender of a sum by the defender in an action of damages, accompanied by a declaration that the pursuers' case was unfounded and untrue, was a tender entitling the defender to expenses in the event of the tender being declined and the sum awarded as damages being less than the sum mentioned in the tender.

In February 1896 Henry Thomson & Company, wholesale Irish whisky merchants, Newry, Ireland, brought an action against Daniel Dailly junior, wine and spirit-merchant, 39 Lochee Road, Dundee, concluding for declarator that “the defender is not entitled to sell or offer for sale, by himself or others acting under or for him, as whisky manufactured or blended by the pursuers, whisky not manufactured or blended by or for the pursuers, or to supply, in implement of orders or requests for Henry Thomson's whisky or Henry Thomson & Company's whisky, or of similar orders or requests, whisky not manufactured or blended by or for the pursuers,” for interdict against the defender so selling such whisky, and for £500 as damages.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Pearson.

The pursuers averred ;—(Cond. 2) “The pursuers have recently become aware that the defender has been in the habit of wilfully and fraudulently, in his said shop, selling as the pursuers' whisky, in reply to orders or requests for that whisky, whisky or other liquor not manufactured or blended by them, and known by the defender not to

No. 206. be manufactured or blended by or for the pursuers, on the false pretence made by the defender, or by his shopman and servants, that such whisky or other liquor was whisky manufactured or blended by the pursuers. The whisky or other liquor sold by the defender was of a quality greatly inferior to the whisky manufactured or blended by the pursuers." The pursuers averred a number of instances of such sales, and then averred;—"The whole of said sales were made fraudulently by the defender or his servants, they well knowing that the whisky sold as the pursuers' was not their manufacture or blend."

July 20, 1897.
Thomson &
Co. v. Dailly.

The pursuers further averred;—(Cond. 6) "By the defender's said wilful and illegal actings the pursuers have suffered loss, injury, and damage, which they estimate at the sum sued for, owing to an inferior whisky being supplied as their whisky to customers who ask for same. The pursuers not merely lose the profit which they would make upon the sales of such whisky, but the reputation of their whisky is seriously injured. The pursuers believe and aver that the said fraudulent sales have been very numerous and extensive."

The defender denied the pursuers' averments.

On 10th March 1896 Kennedy, for the defender, lodged a minute of tender in which he stated "that the defender, while affirming that he had never by himself or persons acting under or for him knowingly sold or offered for sale, or supplied as the pursuers' whisky, whisky which was not the pursuers', and absolutely disclaiming any intention or desire to do so, was anxious to avoid a protracted and expensive contest with the pursuers, especially as, having been in business only six years, he was not in a position to devote the necessary time and means to such contest, from which in no event would any advantage result to him, and therefore, solely with the view of preventing further litigation, but without prejudice to his pleas in law in the event of this tender not being accepted, offered and hereby offers to consent to decree being pronounced in terms of the conclusions for declarator and interdict, and tendered, and hereby tenders, the sum of fifty guineas, together with expenses of process to date, as the same may be taxed by the Auditor, in full of the remaining conclusions of the summons."

The pursuers did not accept this tender.

Thereafter, in July 1896, a proof was led.

At the hearing in the Inner-House counsel for the defender stated that he could not, on the evidence, resist the conclusion that the defender had on a number of occasions during the year 1895 sold whisky as Henry Thomson & Company's which was not Henry Thomson & Company's whisky, but he denied that the defender had so sold the whisky knowingly and fraudulently. Counsel for the defender further admitted that the pursuers were entitled to interdict. The dispute between the parties, therefore, in so far as it depended on the proof, ultimately came to be a question as to the amount of damages. The pursuers maintained that they were entitled to substantial damages, in respect that (as they contended) their averments in cond. 6 had been proved. The defender maintained the pursuers were entitled to nominal damages only, in respect that the pursuers had failed to prove special damage. The evidence on this question was to the following effect:—

The defender became tenant of the premises in the end of 1889 on the death of Mr Macfarlane, the former tenant. He took over from the former tenant's representatives 2 dozen (4 gallons) of the pursuers' No. 206. whisky in bottles with the pursuers' label on them, and in December 1889, and again in May 1892, he bought two similar lots of 2 dozen each from the pursuers. These six dozen were the only whisky of the pursuers that the defender had during his tenancy down to the date of the action. The former tenant had been in the habit of getting from forty to sixty gallons of the pursuers' whisky each year. William Macfarlane, the former tenant's son, deponed that his father had a considerable country connection among farmers and others, who took their family supplies from his father, but, according to witness' observation, this connection seemed to have disappeared after the defender became tenant, and the business to have become a local one in a working-class district.

July 20, 1897.
Thomson &
Co. v. Dailly.

The defender deponed;—" . . . I have kept Henry Thomson's whisky from the time I started business until this case arose, but there was very little demand for it. There was some little demand when I started business, but I discouraged Henry Thomson's business as much as possible, for the simple reason that I had more profit by the other whiskies. . . . Cross.—. . . It is the fact that under my discouragement the demand for Henry Thomson's whisky which existed at first got less. There was at no time a considerable demand for Thomson's whisky. It was worth discouraging, because I thought I could make more out of something else. (Q.) Did that not shew you that there were a good many customers of that business who liked Henry Thomson's whisky? (A.) Not a great many in that district; I would not say that there was a considerable number even. I did succeed in materially diminishing the demand for Henry Thomson's whisky, and I took what I thought the most effective means with that end in view. (Q.) Giving a bad article would be one way of discouraging it? (A.) I did not give a bad article. It would be a very difficult thing to say what would be the most effectual way to discourage the demand for a particular whisky. (Q.) There could be no more effectual mode of discouraging the demand for a good and well-known article than to give something else for it which was of bad quality? (A.) That would be one mode of doing it. (Q.) Have you any doubt that if a person who had been accustomed to get genuine Henry Thomson's whisky got a bad article, which was not Henry Thomson's, he would probably never come back to your shop for it again? (A.) I never knew any of them that could tell Henry Thomson's from another. Henry Thomson's whisky was asked for, and I needed to discourage the demand. (Q.) From your knowledge of the drink trade, have you any doubt that the most effective way of accomplishing your avowed object of discouraging the sale of Thomson's whisky would be to give a bad article of some other kind for it? (A.) It would be a mode, as I said before. I told my shopman that I wanted to discourage the sale of Henry Thomson's whisky, and I told him to try and discourage it as best he could. . . . I do not as a rule water the whisky when it is bought in bottle, but that might be done as an exception. . . . (Q.) I suppose you will have watered Henry Thomson's whisky like its neighbours? (A.) I could not say. It is possible that I may have watered Henry Thomson's whisky in bottle. (Q.) Was that when you were wanting to discourage the sale of it? (A.) I cannot say that that would be the reason of it; it would be to get a little more profit out of it."

No. 206. Mark M'Donald, the defender's assistant, deponed, inter alia,— July 20, 1897. "After I entered defender's employment he told me he always, in all Thomson & cases, recommended his own whisky as much as possible. He told Co. v. Dailly. me he discouraged the sale of Henry Thomson as much as he could, and he told me to discourage it. I did what I could to get people not to take it. I chaffed them, as a rule, out of it. I told them I would give them a better whisky—it would do them more good. If they were persistent in wanting it, they always got it; but if they were not very persistent, I put them past it. My employer's interest in putting them past it was that there was more profit off the one than off the other."

The defender exhibited one of the pursuers' showcards in his shop. The pursuers were an old established firm of Irish whisky-blenders. Their blend was well known in the market as Henry Thomson & Company's Old Irish Whisky. It was distinctive in flavour and colour, and remarkably constant in its special properties, even under chemical analysis; and, as a rule, experts could quite readily single it out from among other whiskies. There was a large sale for it in Scotland, the annual turnover being about £60,000, and the annual turnover in the Dundee district, which extended to Aberdeen, was from £15,000 to £20,000. There was no direct evidence of a falling off in the total sale of the pursuer's whisky in Dundee after the defender's tenancy began.

Robert Brown, Glasgow, the pursuers' agent for Scotland, deponed, inter alia,—"The effect of selling inferior whisky to customers who come asking for Thomson's is to put them off Thomson's whisky. If people regularly drink Thomson's whisky and get it bad, it puts them off and damages our trade. Apart altogether from any profit that Thomson & Company would have derived from satisfying the demand by the real article, there is a very great deal of damage done to our trade by discouraging people from asking for it. It is a serious injury to the character and reputation of the whisky. We find that where a man in a particular locality is selling inferior whisky as ours, our trade drops down in that locality. That represents a large pecuniary loss. I could not possibly put a money value upon it, because we don't know the amount that is done; but I say that is a very serious money damage to our trade and reputation."

There were produced in evidence thirty-five samples of whisky, which had been bought from the defender as "Henry Thomson & Company's whisky" at various dates during the year 1895. Two of these samples were admittedly genuine "Henry Thomson & Company." As regarded the precise character of the remainder there was considerable difference of opinion between the expert witnesses adduced by the pursuers and those adduced by the defender; but for the purposes of the present report it is sufficient to say that in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary it was conclusively proved that twenty-five of the samples were not genuine "Henry Thomson & Company," but something quite different.

Most of the samples had been procured through the agency of a firm of private detectives employed by the pursuers. The account of this firm of detectives against the pursuers amounted to about £54.

On 26th November 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, finds and declares, interdicts, prohibits, and discharges, in terms of the conclusions of the summons : Ordains the defender to pay to the pursuers the sum of No. 206.

ten pounds (£10) sterling in name of damages, and decerns : And in respect of the defender's minute of tender, lodged on 10th March July 20, 1897.
1896, No. 6 of process, finds the pursuers entitled to expenses down Thomson & to said date : Finds the defender entitled to expenses thereafter : Co. v. Dailly.
Allows," &c.*

* "OPINION.—(After considering the questions whether the samples produced in evidence were genuine 'Henry Thomson & Company,' and whether the samples had been produced in the condition in which they had been sold by the defender, and coming to the conclusion that twenty-five of the samples were not genuine as produced, and that they had not been tampered with or altered, except for purposes of analysis, after having been purchased from the defender, his Lordship continued)—On the third question, whether the whisky was so supplied knowingly, I am dispensed from saying much. As I have already observed, mistake or inadvertence on the part of the defender is out of the case, according to the evidence on both sides. This is not a case where the defender, not professing to sell or to keep Henry Thomson's whisky at all, may have furnished an Irish whisky to those asking for 'Thomson,' on the footing that it was reasonable fulfilment of the request. The defender professed to keep and supply Thomson whisky, and had a conspicuous sign conspicuously displayed over the bar to that effect. The samples were asked for as Henry Thomson & Company's old Irish whisky, or in similar unmistakable terms; and they were habitually supplied out of a labelled 'Henry Thomson' bottle, and (though in one case this is left in some doubt) at a 'Henry Thomson' price, where the quantity taken was sufficient to indicate the price.

"The defender says he desired to discourage the sale of Henry Thomson's whisky, because he made relatively more profit out of cheaper whiskies. He certainly had very little 'Thomson' to go on with, and there is a remarkable falling off in the turnover of Thomson's whisky in his establishment compared with what it was in Macfarlane's time, though this is no doubt partly attributable to the difference in the class of customers, as explained in the evidence. But the defender got so little of Thomson's whisky during his seven years of the business, including two dozen to start with, two dozen ordered in December 1889, and two dozen more in May 1892, that the pursuers submitted figures to shew that unless he was selling other whiskies as 'Henry Thomson's,' he had not enough on his own shewing to supply the demand. But their figures fall short of demonstration, and I do not proceed on this as a ground of judgment. There is, however, a significant admission by the defender, which shews that he was eking out his supply. He had no 'Henry Thomson' in bulk, it was all in bottle. Whisky sold in bulk is over-proof, and requires to be watered; not so with bottled whisky, which is furnished as a specific merchantable article, ready for consumption. Now the defender says :—'It is possible that I may have watered Henry Thomson's whisky in bottle. (Q.) Was that when you were wanting to discourage the sale of it? (A.) I cannot say that would be the reason of it; it would be to get a little more profit out of it.' It is impossible to say how much there is behind this admission. But it is quite possible that one who did that not very flagrant thing might think it even comparatively meritorious, as well as safer under the Food and Drugs Act, to fill it up with cheap whisky instead of Dundee water. At all events, one who admits even so much does not hold a very secure position from which to make kindred charges against others.

"As to the amount to be awarded in name of damages, the pursuers asked for an exemplary sum. In my opinion, however, the proof affords no ground for making any safe calculation of the amount of loss sustained by the pursuer's firm, and I therefore propose to follow the course

No. 206. The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The defender having ^{not} conceded that the pursuers were entitled to interdict, the only questions were as to the amount of damages and as to expenses. The pursuers maintained that they were entitled to substantial damages and that to an amount exceeding the defender's tender; and that being established it followed of course that the pursuers were entitled to expenses; but even if the pursuers did not succeed in getting a larger sum than £50 in name of damages, they were nevertheless entitled to expenses, the tender being a qualified tender. (1) On the question of the amount of damages, it was difficult to understand the principle on which the Lord Ordinary had proceeded in reaching the sum of £10 which he had awarded. If it was nominal damages which the Lord Ordinary intended to award, £10 was too large a sum. If substantial damages were intended, the grounds of the award were indefensible, since the award was professedly based on what had been done in another case, and not on the evidence in the present case. The evidence here presented a strong case for awarding very substantial damages. The defender, who admitted that interdict must go out, had in his evidence deponed that he did everything in his power to discourage the sale of the pursuers' whisky; and the

July 20, 1897.
Thomson &
Co. v. Dailly.

adopted in a previous case at the instance of the same pursuers, and to award £10."

"Since the above was written, I have been informed that the defender lodged a minute of tender on 10th March 1896, and I have heard counsel as to the bearing which it has on the question of expenses. The defender argues that it has effect as an ordinary judicial tender, and that while he is liable in expenses down to its date, he is entitled to expenses thereafter. The pursuers urge that, owing to the qualifications with which the minute is introduced, it is not to be regarded as a tender at all. I have considered its terms carefully in reference to the rule that a judicial tender must be precise and unconditional, or, as it is sometimes put, unqualified. I think this tender is so, within the meaning of that rule. The affirmation of innocence, and of the desire to avoid litigation with which it is prefaced, does not amount to a condition or qualification intrinsic to the offer made: the best test of that being that if the tender had been accepted the pursuers would have got decree in terms of the whole conclusions of their summons, subject only to the variance in the amount of damages. But the pursuers say that they are now entitled to more than decree in terms of the conclusions; that the proof having been led, and it being proved that on various occasions the defender knowingly and wrongfully sold as whisky blended by the pursuers whisky which was not so blended, they are entitled to have a finding to that effect inserted in the interlocutor as introductory to the decree of interdict,—a result which certainly would not have been reached had the tender been accepted. In this view they would to that extent get more than was tendered, as the finding would (I am informed) be inserted in the extract decree. If this is the true criterion, it would follow that I can make the tender good or bad, according as I withhold or give such a finding—a startling result. I had been disposed to insert such a finding when originally considering the case, until I found that in the case of Bevy decree was given simply in terms of the conclusions, which were the same as those in the present action. I am not disposed to insert the finding now merely for the purpose of enabling the pursuers to exclude the tender, even assuming it would have that effect. I accordingly uphold the defender's contention on this point."

evidence clearly proved that he had on a number of occasions sold inferior whisky under the name of the pursuers' whisky, with, it could not be doubted, the intention, and certainly with the result, of injuring the reputation of the pursuers' whisky, and so of discouraging people from buying it. It was not for the defender, with such evidence against him, to object that the items of damage had not been specifically proved, as might be legitimate enough in a case of innocent mistake; the Court, sitting as a jury, would assess the loss suffered by the pursuers as shewn by a reasonable view of the evidence; and so regarding the question, the loss proved was much greater than the sum tendered. Further, the pursuers had incurred an account of £54 to the firm of private detectives employed by them to investigate the defender's conduct. That was a legitimate item of damage, just as surveyor's fees were considered part of the damages in maritime cases. (2) Even if the amount of damages was held to be less than the sum tendered, the result, looking to the terms in which the tender was expressed, was quoad expenses the same. The pursuers' object in bringing such actions as the present was to put down serious and fraudulent interference with their trade; it was no part of their business to extort sums in name of damages from retail dealers who protested their innocence and against whom nothing had been proved. The tender therefore was not a tender which the pursuers were bound to accept; and now that the proof had been led and had established the defender's fraudulent conduct, the pursuers were entitled to a finding affirming that fraud, and thus they would obtain a decree in excess of the tender, even if the damages awarded remained at the sum fixed by the Lord Ordinary.

Argued for the defender;—The defender's position was, and had throughout been, that he was willing to make the utmost concessions in reason in order to avoid a litigation, from which he could, in no event, gain any pecuniary advantage. He conceded the pursuers' right to interdict, which involved the admission that the pursuers had proved in a sufficient number of cases sales of whisky as the pursuers' which was not in fact the pursuers', but in order to entitle them to interdict it was not necessary for them to prove that the sales were fraudulent, and the defender not having been guilty of fraud, was not to be held as admitting fraud by conceding the pursuers' right to interdict. (1) Upon the question of damages, the defender acquiesced in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but he did not support that award or the grounds on which it was based, any more than he conceded that the £50 which he had tendered really represented loss suffered by the pursuers, and the pursuers having maintained that they were entitled to a much larger award, it was necessary for the defender to argue the question on principle. So taking the question, the defender maintained that the pursuers were entitled to nominal damages only—one farthing or one shilling. The defender, no doubt, admitted that he took the most effective means in his power to discourage the sale of the pursuers' whisky. That was quite within his right, provided that the means he adopted were legitimate. Every retail dealer, if he used legitimate means only, was entitled to push the sale of such articles as he found to be most profitable to himself, and to discourage the sale of such as he found to be less profitable. It was said, however, that the defender had used illegitimate means—that he had fraudulently sold inferior whisky under the pursuers' name. Assume for the sake of argument that he had done so. The pursuers were entitled in

No. 206.

July 20, 1897.
Thomson &
Co. v. Dailly.

No. 206. name of damages to no more than a sum representing the actual loss that they had sustained by reason of this assumed fraudulent conduct. July 20, 1897. The action was not a proceeding in pœnam, but was a civil action of damages to which the ordinary rule applied, that the measure of damages was the loss which the pursuer proved that he had suffered. Thomson & Co. v. Dailly. In ordinary actions of damages for slander, solatium for injured feelings was a relevant element in determining the sum to be awarded, and of necessity the sum to be awarded as solatium was just such a sum as the jury might consider reasonable in the whole circumstances. But solatium had no place in actions on account of trade slander; in such actions and in all actions on account of loss to trade through the wrongous act of another, the amount of loss being capable of precise determination, must be proved specifically, otherwise nominal damages only would be allowed.¹ In the present case no attempt had been made to prove special damage. As to the suggestion that the sum paid by the pursuers to the detectives was a legitimate item of damage, that was warranted neither on authority nor in principle. Possibly such expenditure might be a proper charge in a successful party's account of expenses, if treated as expert evidence, but as increasing the amount of the damages it was out of the question. (2) As to the argument that the tender was expressed in such terms as to make it a conditional tender, that argument proceeded on the assumption that a defender making a tender was bound not only to agree to decree against him going out, but also to admit everything averred by the pursuer against him. That assumption was ill-founded. A tender need not contain an express admission of wrong, and might contain a statement to the contrary. A defender in making a tender might expressly reserve his statements and pleas, and also deny that the pursuer had any claim against him at all.² If the pursuers had accepted the tender, they would have had a decree exactly in the terms of the decree here, except that they would have had £50 of damages and no expenses awarded against them.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question here has really come to be one regarding the expenses of the action.

The case is certainly a very peculiar one. The Lord Ordinary has disposed of it upon the footing that the defender has been guilty for a considerable time of intentional fraud in dealing with the pursuers' whisky, and the defender has declined to impugn the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in so far as it finds that for a considerable time the defender has been in the habit of selling whisky as of the pursuers' manufacture when it was not in fact of their manufacture. Now, that is certainly a serious matter, and it is by no means an easy thing to estimate the amount of damage which has been caused in consequence of such a proceeding.

Various questions have been raised before us, the real point between the parties turning upon this, that as the Lord Ordinary has given a sum of damages which turns out to be less than the sum which had been tendered by the defender, the result of course is such that a very large part of the very heavy expenses incurred in this case have been awarded to the unsuccessful defender; and in order to obviate that result, the pursuers have urged various considerations with the view of increasing the amount of the damages by bringing in items which presumably the Lord Ordinary did not take into consideration, as otherwise it is said he could not have awarded so small a sum as he has actually awarded.

¹ Morton v. Barclay, March 15, 1824, 3 Mur. 401; Leather Cloth Co. v. Hirschfeld, 1865, L. R., 1 Eq. 299.

² Strachan v. Munro, July 5, 1845, 7 D. 993, 17 Scot. Jur. 514; Muckarsies v. Dickson, Nov. 28, 1848, 11 D. 164, 21 Scot. Jur. 31; Mitchells v. Nicoll, May 24, 1890, 17 R. 795.

No. 206.

July 20, 1897.

Thomson &
Co. v. Dailly.

It is said, in the first place, that part of the damage suffered by the pursuers consisted in the expenses to which they were put in establishing their case by sending persons to purchase whisky at the defender's place and thereby obtaining evidence of the frauds. Now, no case was quoted to us in which such an item—although it is an item which must have occurred in many cases—has been regarded as a legitimate element in fixing the amount of the damages in actions like the present, and it is difficult to see how such an investigation—though necessary in the interest of the party making it—can be held to be part of the damages caused by the person who does the wrong. But I give no final opinion upon that, for I have not seen sufficient reason for dealing with that matter as a ground for raising the damages in this case. I think that the case can be disposed of on another ground without entering into that question at all.

The Lord Ordinary, in considering the question of damages, says this,—“The proof affords no ground for making any safe calculation of the amount of loss sustained by the pursuers' firm, and I therefore propose to follow the course adopted in a previous case at the instance of the same pursuers, and to award £10.”

Now, if that sentence was one stating reasons which induced the Lord Ordinary to award this sum of £10 I should certainly have hesitated to interfere with the amount, because it always is inadvisable, except upon strong grounds, to interfere with the amount of damages ascertained by a Lord Ordinary; but I must say that I do not think that the statement is one which gives any reason, save that the same award of damages was given in another case, and I am unable to regard that as a reason. The conditions of the two cases may have been entirely different. The question depends in great measure upon how the things which caused the injury were done and upon the extent to which they were done. It does not appear to me to be a safe mode of proceeding for a Judge to take one case, although brought by the same person, and having ascertained that in that case an award of £10 had been made, to say,—“Because it is not very easy to estimate the amount of loss sustained by the pursuers' firm in this case, I will therefore give the same award as in the other case.” It is perfectly true, as the Lord Ordinary says, that it is not easy to make a safe calculation of the exact damage, but that is just what occurs in a great many cases. It must be estimated in a reasonable way. If it cannot be estimated with exactitude one must form one's opinion as a juryman would of the damage due upon the whole circumstances of the case, and make the best reasonable estimate that one can.

In this case I cannot for one moment say that making the most reasonable estimate that I am able to do I would have arrived at such a sum as £10. This is a matter of trade dealing, and trade dealing carried on upon a large

No. 206. scale, and it is one in which, if one set to work to diminish the sales of a particular article that was offered to the public, the damage that would be done by such a proceeding might be very large indeed. In this case it is quite certain, on defender's own statements, that he was anxious to damage the sale of the whisky of the pursuers, that is to say, that he was anxious to induce people not to buy that whisky when they wanted it, but to buy other whisky, and the mode he took to do that has been found to be a fraudulent mode, by selling as Thomson's whisky when people wished to have it something which was not Thomson's whisky, with the result that when people found what they believed Thomson's whisky to be an inferior article, they ceased to purchase Thomson's whisky. The defender's object may have been to make people cease purchasing Thomson's whisky from him, but the injury would not by any means stop there. If persons have asked for a particular article made by a particular maker, and an inferior article is sold to them under the name of that maker, they form an opinion that the manufacture of that article is deteriorating, and they not only cease to buy it for themselves but they naturally discourage other people from buying it. It is quite a reasonable deduction from the whole evidence in this case that persons who had bought what was called Thomson's whisky from the defender ceased to buy Thomson's whisky anywhere, and also that they informed others that Messrs Thomson's whisky was not so good as it was, and therefore led other people not to buy it. Now, a fraud of that kind in a peculiar trade like this is necessarily a serious fraud, and proceeding on the view which I take that it is a serious fraud, I think it must be dealt with as a serious fraud in the question of damages. It is not easy by any means to estimate the amount of damage, as the Lord Ordinary truly says, but I certainly think it cannot be estimated except at a very considerable sum, and giving the best consideration I have been able to give, the opinion I have formed is that £100 would be a very suitable sum of damages to give against this defender for his fraudulent conduct.

Therefore I move your Lordships to alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and assess the damages at £100, finding the defender liable in expenses.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree in the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived.

The action is directed against the defender for interdict of certain conduct of the defender, and also for damages in respect of that conduct. The pursuers' case is substantially set out in cond. 2—(His Lordship read it). Now, the case so averred by the pursuers is not only found proved by the Lord Ordinary, but it is admitted by the defender that he sold as the pursuers' whisky an article which was not the pursuers' whisky. In his evidence he admits that he did this, and he states that he desired to put down and keep down the sale of the pursuers' whisky.

In article 6 of the condescendence the consequence of this is thus averred by the pursuers—(His Lordship read article 6). So that the claim for damages which the pursuers make in this action is based upon the ground that this fraudulent conduct on the part of the defender in selling, as the pursuers' whisky, whisky which the defender knew was not theirs, damaged their trade, and damaged it to the extent stated, as the natural consequence of such conduct, and this the pursuers say is proved. There is no doubt that it was so intended, for the defender in his evidence says that the demand for the pursuers' whisky was worth discouraging, because he could make more out of others. He says,—“I did succeed in materially diminishing the demand for Henry Thomson's whisky, and took what I thought was the most effective means with that end in view.” Then it is put to him,—“Have you any doubt that the most effective way of accomplishing your avowed object of discouraging the sale of Thomson's whisky would be to give a bad article of some other kind for it?” (A.) “It would be a mode, as I said before. I told my shopman that I wanted to discourage the sale of Henry Thomson's whisky, and I told him to try and discourage it as best he could.” That being the view arrived at in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and as I have pointed out practically admitted by the defender, the only question is one of the amount of damages.

No. 206.
July 20, 1897.
Thomson &
Co. v. Dailly.

Now, this is not a count and reckoning to see what the profits are on the one hand or the exact loss sustained by the pursuers on the other; it is a general action of damages,—a question as to the amount of damages in an action by a sufferer from a course of misconduct against the party who is guilty of that misconduct.

One question which was argued was whether it would be reasonable in estimating the amount of damages to take into account the expenses to which the pursuers were necessarily put in detecting the misconduct. With your Lordship, I desire to express no opinion upon that question. I avow it all the more readily, and I think all the more properly, because this is not put forward as a ground of a claim on record. The claim of damage as put on record is solely founded upon this, that the pursuers' trade was damaged by conduct which had a tendency to damage it, and which was intended to have that effect; and we must estimate the damage generally as best we can in a general question of damage. Doing that here upon the evidence before us, which is to the effect, not only that this conduct was pursued, and pursued with that aim and object, but that it was followed by a very notable falling off in the sales of the pursuers' whisky in Dundee, I think there is ground for giving a substantial sum of damages, which the Lord Ordinary has not done, and without entering on the matter of the legitimacy of taking into account in estimating the damages the expenses to which the pursuers were properly put in taking proper and reasonable measures to detect the fraud, I agree with your Lordship that the damage might with propriety be estimated at £100.

That removes any necessity for considering any specialties in the tender here. I avoid giving any opinion upon that question, upon which something was said on both sides, only observing with reference to that, that I think tenders in such terms as this ought to be avoided, and that when a tender is made it ought not to be accompanied with emphatic declarations that the pursuers' case is unfounded and untrue. I altogether abstain from expressing any opinion judicially as to the position of the pursuer of an action upon such allegations as we have here who refuses to accept a sum of damages offered which is accompanied by a statement, and qualified by that statement, that the ground upon which the claim is made is abso-

No. 206. lutely untrue. A great deal might depend on the nature of the allegation in the particular case; but I avoid that question here, because the question does not arise, and is of no practical importance if we are of opinion that the damages offered in this tender are less than the damages to which the pursuers are entitled.

July 20, 1897.
Thomson &
Co. v. Dailly.

I think, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be affirmed substituting only £100 for the £10 which he gave, and finding the pursuers entitled to expenses against the defender.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. With your Lordships I abstain from expressing any opinion on the questions whether the defender's tender is an effective tender, looking to the terms in which it is expressed; and also whether the expenses of the detectives who actually discovered this fraud and became witnesses to it afterwards should be included or considered in estimating the damages due to the pursuers. I agree in the result at which your Lordships have arrived, that the £10 found due by the Lord Ordinary is quite inadequate. I think it is a case for exemplary damages. I do not say that there should be vindictive damages, but I think that the pursuers' case may be regarded liberally, because the defender persistently over a long course of time has done all he could to hurt the pursuers' trade by deteriorating the character of the whisky he was selling. I am a little astonished (because it is unusual in cases of this kind) to find the defender acknowledging that in what he did he was doing all he could to injure Henry Thomson & Company's trade, not because their whisky was a bad thing to supply to his customers nor because he had a better to offer in its place, but simply because according to his own evidence, his object was the making of more profit for himself on something else. When you take that to be the object and purpose for which the defender acted fraudulently for several months, and consider that the result of his proceedings (according again to his own statement) was that the demand which existed for the pursuers' whisky ultimately got less, I think the defender may be reasonably called upon to bear the result of such conduct on the pursuers' trade. The Lord Ordinary says in language which your Lordship quoted, that "the proof affords no ground for making any safe calculation of the amount of loss sustained by the pursuers' firm." I fancy what his Lordship means is "any precise calculation," because "safe calculation" would affect a finding of £10 as much as £1000. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that in this case no precise figure is proved as the damage arising from the defender's conduct. That there was damage done is admitted by the defender, because he says that the result of his discouragement of the trade was to decrease that trade. Therefore there was some damage done by the defender's wrongful and fraudulent proceedings. In these circumstances, while it is impossible to say what was the actual amount of damage done to the pursuers' business, we can as a jury estimate the loss, and upon that matter I agree that, sitting as a jury, we are not giving the pursuers too much by assessing the damage at £100.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. I think this is a case in which the pursuers are entitled to substantial damages, and I do not think the sum of £100 is excessive. I think the Lord Ordinary has been No. 206, influenced to a considerable extent by the sum awarded in the case of Begg.¹ July 20, 1897. I was the Lord Ordinary in that case, and, speaking from recollection, the Thomson & Co. v. Dailly. misdoings of Begg were trifling compared with the misdoings of the defender in the present case. I do not think that in *Begg's*¹ case there was any evidence of any avowed intention on his part to injure the trade of the pursuers. That being so, I think the Lord Ordinary was probably misled in taking the sum awarded in that case. The present case is very different. The number of instances in which the defender is proved to have sold as the pursuers' whisky an adulterated whisky is six times as numerous at least as in Begg's case. He avows the intention in one way or another of putting a stop to the sale of the pursuers' whisky—although he does not admit that it was adulterated whisky that he endeavoured to substitute for it. On the whole matter, I think £100 is not too large a sum to award.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find and declare, interdict, prohibit, and discharge in terms of the conclusions of the action: Ordain the defender to pay to the pursuers the sum of £100 sterling in name of damages: Decern, and find the defender liable in expenses."

BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN GILHOOLY, Pursuer.

JAMES M'HARDY, Defender.—Baxter—Cosens.

No. 207.

July 20, 1897.*
Gilhooly v.
M'Hardy.

Process—Jury Trial—Abandonment—A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, sec. 46.—In an action of damages, a verdict in the pursuer's favour was set aside, and a new trial granted, the diet for the trial being 14th June. On 12th June counsel and agents for the pursuer proposed to lodge a minute of abandonment, on the ground that no new evidence was obtainable, but the pursuer refused to consent to this, and they in consequence withdrew from the case, and the diet for trial was discharged and the jury countermanded. The defender then lodged a note praying the Court to grant decree of absolver, with expenses. A copy of this note was sent to the pursuer on 14th June, with an intimation that it would be moved on 16th June. The Court, on the motion being made in terms of the note for the defender, there being no appearance for the pursuer, delayed consideration of the case for two days, and ordered further intimation to be made to the pursuer. This having been done, and no answer from the pursuer having been received, and no appearance being made for him, the Court granted the prayer of the note.

On 4th February 1897 the trial of an action of damages, brought by John Gilhooly against James M'Hardy, took place before Lord Moncreiff and a jury, when a verdict for the pursuer, assessing the damages at £30, was returned. 2D DIVISION.

On 3d March the Second Division granted a new trial, which was fixed to take place before the Lord Justice-Clerk on Monday, 14th June.

On the morning of Saturday, 12th June, the defender's agents received from the pursuer's agents a copy of a note to the Lord

¹ This was an action by the present pursuers against another defender, referred to by the Lord Ordinary supra.

* Decided June 18, 1897.

No. 207. Justice-Clerk on behalf of the pursuer, which, inter alia, stated,— July 20, 1897. “The pursuer has been unable to procure further evidence in the Gilhooly v. cause than that upon which he procured his former verdict, and in M’Hardy. these circumstances he accordingly begs leave to state that he does not intend to proceed with said new trial, and consents to absolver of the defender, with expenses.” The pursuer’s agents, in their letter sending the copy note, stated that the principal note would be lodged with the Clerk of Court, and moved on that day.

This motion was not made. Guy, who had been counsel for the pursuer, appeared, and informed the Court that after the note had been intimated, the pursuer had refused to sign it or allow it to be signed, and that counsel and agents had ceased to act for pursuer. The diet for the trial of the cause was discharged and the jury countermanded.
 No appearance was made for the defender on 12th June.

On 14th June the defender sent a registered letter to the pursuer enclosing a copy of a note to the Lord Justice-Clerk, and intimating that the Court would be moved, in terms of the note, on 16th June.

The note (No. 22 of process) prayed the Lord Justice-Clerk to move the Court to assoilzie the defender, with expenses.

On 16th June, in Single Bills, counsel for the defender argued in support of the note;—When it appeared that a pursuer had abandoned his suit, the Court was bound to hold him as confessed. The provision of the A. S., 16th February 1841, sec. 46,* in so far as regarded abandonment, was still in force,¹ although the provision regarding delay for twelve months had been superseded by the Court of Session Act, 1850, sec. 40.² The pursuer here must be held to have abandoned his suit; he had had intimation of the present motion and had not appeared. The difficulty arose from the jury having been countermanded. If the jury had been empanelled and the pursuer had not appeared, the defender could then have proceeded in terms of the latter part of section 46 of the A. S., 16th February 1841. It was true that he could still get a jury summoned by proceeding under the A. S., 24th February 1846,† and that having been

¹ Ross v. Mackenzie, June 26, 1889, 16 R. 871.

² Macfarlane v. Beattie & Sons, July 1, 1892, 19 R. 953; Baird v.
 Cornelius, July 16, 1881, 8 R. 982.

* The Act of Sederunt, 16th February 1841, sec. 46, enacts as follows:
 —“That if it shall be made to appear to the Court that a party has abandoned his suit, or if the pursuer or the party appointed to stand as pursuer, shall not proceed to trial within twelve months after issues have been finally engrossed and signed, the Court shall proceed therein as in cases in which parties are held as confessed, unless sufficient cause be shewn for the delay to the satisfaction of the Court. And in case either party shall not appear at the trial of a cause after due notice of trial has been given by the opposite party, the party appearing, if pursuer in the issue, shall be entitled to lead his evidence and go to the jury for a verdict; and if the party appearing be the defender in the issue, he shall be entitled to obtain a verdict in his favour without leading evidence, but if the party appearing shall decline to proceed in this manner, then the Judge presiding at the trial shall certify to the Division the fact of the other party not appearing, and the Division shall thereupon proceed as in cases in which parties are held as confessed, unless it shall be shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that the failure of the party to appear at the trial was occasioned by some sufficient cause.”

† The Act of Sederunt of 24th February 1846 enacts, inter alia, as done, he could then proceed under section 46 of the earlier A. S., but it was an operose and expensive method to summon a jury in order that the Court might pronounce a decree of absolvitor. No. 207.

Guy attended at the bar and in answer to the Court stated that he had no instructions. July 20, 1897.
Gilhooly v. M'Hardy.

The Court intimated that they would dispose of the case on the 18th of June, and directed intimation to be made to the pursuer.

On the same day the defender's agents sent a registered letter to the pursuer intimating that the case had been before the Second Division, and that their Lordships were to give their decision on the note on 18th June.

A copy of the registered letter was lodged in process, with a post-office registration receipt appended (No. 24 of process).

On 18th June counsel for the defender appeared and stated that no answers had been received to the letters of intimation sent to the pursuer.

There was no appearance for the pursuer.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the note for the defender, No. 22 of process, along with the production No. 24 of process, assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find him entitled to expenses," &c.

GORDON PETRIE & SHAND, S.S.O., Agents.

JOHN MOONEY, Pursuer.

WILLIAM DIXON, LIMITED, Defenders.—Clyde.

No. 208.

Process—Jury Trial—Abandonment—A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, sec. 46.—The pursuer in an action of damages for personal injury, whose agent had ceased to act for him, failed to pay the fee fund dues necessary, in terms of the A. S., 18th December 1896, to enable a precept for citation of a jury to be transmitted to the Sheriff. In consequence no jury was cited to try the cause on the day appointed for the trial. The defender then moved the Court to pronounce decree of absolvitor. The Court directed intimation of the motion to be made to the pursuer, and thereafter no reply having been received from him, and no appearance being made for him, assoilzied the defenders, with expenses. July 20, 1897.*
Mooney v. William Dixon, Limited.

In an action of damages by John Mooney against William Dixon, 2D DIVISION.

follows:—"That as soon as the issue or issues in the cause are finally engrossed and lodged in the office in the Register House, it shall be competent to the pursuer in the issue or issues to give notice of trial; and if the pursuer does not give notice of trial within ten days from the time the said issue or issues are so lodged as aforesaid, or, after giving notice of trial, countermands the same and does not renew the notice of trial within ten days after such countermand, it shall thereafter be competent to the defender to give notice of trial to the pursuer, and also to countermand such notice of trial in like manner as is competent to the pursuer. But if the defender countermands then the pursuer's right to take the lead shall recur for other ten days from the date of such countermand. . . . And the party who shall be served with a countermand shall be entitled to such expense as may have been incurred in consequence of such notice of trial, and which may not be available for the trial of the cause when it afterwards takes place."

* Decided July 13, 1897.

No. 208. Limited, an issue was approved for the trial of the cause, and the case was appointed to be tried on 2d July 1897.
July 20, 1897. Thereafter the pursuer's law-agents ceased to act for him, and the Mooney v. pursuer failed to pay the dues exigible in terms of the A. S., 18th
William Dec. 1896, I. 23 (5)—which enacts that Law Courts' stamps for £2
Dixon, must be affixed to the precept for citation of the jury before it is Limited. transmitted to the Sheriff. In consequence of this failure no jury was cited, and the trial did not take place on 2d July.

On that day counsel for the defenders moved the Court for decree of absolvitor, with expenses, in respect of the circumstances above detailed, and referred to the immediately preceding case of Gilhooly v. M'Hardy.

The Court directed the defenders to make intimation to the pursuer that in the event of his not taking steps to go on with the jury trial they would move for absolvitor on a specified day.

The defenders' agents on the same day sent a registered letter to the pursuer giving him notice that upon Saturday, 10th July, they would move the Court to assoilzie the defenders, with expenses, in respect of the pursuer's failure to provide for citation of a jury and of his failure to appear at the trial.

A copy of this letter was lodged in process.

On 13th July counsel for the defenders appeared and stated that intimation had been duly made and no answer received. He moved for absolvitor, with expenses.

There was no appearance for the pursuer.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, in respect of the pursuer's failure to cite a jury, and of the intimation made to him, dismiss the appeal, and assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find them entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court," &c.

W. & J. BURNES, W.S., Agents.

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN

VOLUME XXIV.

Cases decided in the House of Lords are printed in italics.
Cases decided in the Court of Justiciary will be found under the heads
JUSTICIARY CASES, POLICE, POLICE FORCE, PUBLIC HEALTH, and PUBLIC-HOUSE.

ABANDONMENT. See Insurance, 2—Process, 27, 28—Public Burden, 3.

ACCOUNTING. See Agent and Client, 2, 3, 4—Discharge, 3.

ACQUIESCENCE. See Agent and Principal, 4—Public Burden, 3.

ACTIO POPULARIS. See Nuisance.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. Judge—Declinature—Waiver—Court of Justiciary.

1. A railway company appealed to the High Court of Justiciary against a judgment of a Sheriff acquitting a person of a contravention of one of the company's statutes. Two of the Judges proposed a declinature on the ground that they were shareholders in the company. Question, whether it was competent for the parties to waive the declinature by joint minute. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Ramsay, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 48.

Law-agent—Petition for removal of law-agent's name from roll—"Written application"—Law-Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873, sec. 14.

2. The written application by an agent to have his name removed from any of the registers kept under the Law-Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873, may be made directly to the keeper of the register. Incorporated Society of Law-Agents v. Purves, Jan. 22, 1897, p. 394.

Law-Agent—Petition for removal of law-agent's name from roll—Proof—Law-Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873.

3. A society of solicitors petitioned the Court to have the name of S., one of their number, struck off the roll of enrolled law-agents, on the ground that he had been guilty of fraud and embezzlement. It being alleged that S. had left the country, the order for service allowed a period of six weeks for the lodging of answers. The petition was served edictally. No answers were lodged. Held that, as S. had been neither convicted of the offences charged against him nor fugitated, the petitioners must prove their averments before the prayer of the petition could be granted. Society of Solicitors in Aberdeen, Feb. 5, 1897, p. 511.

ADMISSION. See Process, 4.

ADOPTION. See Minor and Pupil, 4.

AGENT (LAW). See Administration of Justice, 2, 3.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Writ of Agent—Accession to composition agreement.

1. Held that the accession by a creditor to a composition agreement may be proved by the writ of his duly authorised agent. Henry v. Strachan & Spence, July 10, 1897, p. 1045.

Business Account—Taxation—Discharge.

2. Beneficiary's right to taxation of business account of agent to trustees after settlement. M'Farlane v. M'Farlane's Trustees, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 574.

AGENT AND CLIENT—Continued.Business Account—Taxation—Auditor.

3. Right of law-agent to have his account taxed by local auditor. Turner v. Fraser's Trustees, March 6, 1897, p. 673.

Business Account—Taxation—Trust.

4. Scale of charges for attending meetings of trustees when law-agent himself is a trustee. Turner v. Fraser's Trustees, March 6, 1897, p. 673.

Expenses.

5. Decree in name of agent-disburser. Paolo v. Parias, July 3, 1897, p. 1030.

Expenses—Charging Order.

6. Law-Agents and Notaries Public (Scotland) Act, 1891, sec. 6. "Recovered or preserved on behalf of client." Carruthers' Trustee v. Finlay & Wilson, Jan. 16, 1897, p. 363.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. Agent's powers—Ship—Charter-party.

1. Deviation from charter-party by charterer's agent at port of loading. Lindsay & Son v. Scholefield, Feb. 19, 1897, p. 530.

Agent's powers—Insurance.

2. Authority of agent to receive payment of fire insurance premium, and to effect insurance on behalf of insurance company. M'Elroy v. London Assurance Corporation, Jan. 6, 1897, p. 287.

Liability of Agent who has acted contrary to instructions.

3. The charterer of a ship having litigated unsuccessfully with the ship-owners a question as to the mode of discharge depending on the terms of the charter-party, and having been found liable in demurrage and expenses, brought an action for relief against the shipping-agent, through whom he had effected the charter, on the ground that the shipping-agent had taken the charter-party in the terms in which it was taken contrary to instructions. Held that the shipping-agent was not liable, in respect the loss had not been caused by his failure to take the charter-party in terms of his instructions, but by the pursuer's failure to take delivery in terms of the charter-party. Barkley & Sons v. Simpson, Jan. 16, 1897, p. 346.

Iron-broker.

4. Carrying over—Averaging purchases by broker—Broker acting as principal—Acquiescence. Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Hope, June 16, 1897, p. 944.

See Revenue, 4.

AGREEMENT. See Contract.

ALIMENTARY PROVISION. See Marriage-contract, 2.

ANNUITY. See Lease, 1.

APPEAL (HOUSE OF LORDS). Interlocutor ordaining defender to commence building operations within specified period—Effect of judgment in appeal affirming interlocutor—Decree ad factum præstandum.

1. By interlocutor dated 18th July 1895, the First Division ordained the defenders in an action to commence certain building operations "within three months from the date of this interlocutor." The defenders appealed to the House of Lords, but subsequently, with their consent, the interlocutors appealed against were affirmed and the appeal dismissed. Held that the period within which the defenders were bound to commence building was three months from the date of the judgment of the House of Lords. Marshall v. Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co., Limited, Oct. 22, 1896, p. 33.

Leave to appeal.

2. Leave to appeal against an interlocutor repelling a plea of no title to sue, and quoad ultra allowing a proof before answer, refused. Assets Co., Limited, v. Shirres' Trustees, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 418.

For Appeals to other Courts, see Election Law, 4—Justiciary Cases, 35, 36, 37—Process, 27, 28, 29, 43 to 46—Sheriff, 3.

APPOINTMENT (POWER OF). See Succession, 15.

APPREHENSION (BY POLICE OFFICERS). See Police Force, 2, 3.

APPREHENSION (WRONGOUS). See Reparation, 4.

APPROPRIATION. See Election Law, 1.

ARBITRATION. Procedure extra cursum curiæ.

1. Objection to the competency of an appeal on the ground that the respondent had so deviated from the statutory course of procedure as virtually to constitute the Sheriff an arbiter, repelled. Gordon v. Bruce & Co., May 12, 1897, p. 844.

Clause of reference—Construction—Sale.

2. Clause of reference in a contract of sale of sugar between A, who was a member of the Beetroot Sugar Association, and B, who was not a member, on a construction of which it was held that the council of the association was referee of all disputes, and that the decision of the council that one of the rules of the association applied to B, although not a member, was final. Stewart, Brown, & Co. v. Grime, Jan. 27, 1897, p. 414.

Bank—Savings Bank—Depositor—Action by depositor—Savings Banks Acts Amendment Act, 1863, sec. 48.

3. M brought an action against the trustees of a savings bank for payment of £50 which had been deposited in her name, and which she alleged the officials of the bank had paid away upon a forged order to another person. The defenders denied that the order was forged, or that they were responsible even if it was. They pleaded that the action was excluded by the arbitration clause (sec. 48) of the Savings Banks Acts Amendment Act, 1863. At the date when the action was brought M had no funds at her credit in the books of the bank. Held that the action being founded upon the contract of deposit involved a question between the bank and a depositor in the sense of the statute, which fall to be decided by arbitration. Melrose v. Trustees for Edinburgh Savings Bank, Feb. 2, 1897, p. 483.

See Railway, 1.

ARRESTMENT. Petition for recall of arrestments—Answers—Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 21.

1. Competency of appeal against judgment recalling arrestments, where no answers lodged—Necessity for answers—Extra cursum curiæ—Arbitration. Gordon v. Bruce & Co., May 12, 1897, p. 844.

Foreign—Competition as to right in moveables in warehouse in Scotland.

2. Goldsmith, a domiciled Englishman, resident in London, was the owner of certain whisky lying in a bonded warehouse in Glasgow, and held a warrant for the whisky granted by the warehouse-keepers, bearing that they held the whisky to order of Goldsmith "or assigns by indorsement hereon." By contract executed in London, Goldsmith borrowed £3000 from Inglis, also a domiciled Englishman, on the security of the whisky, and indorsed and delivered the warrant to Inglis. Thereafter, Robertson & Baxter, creditors of Goldsmith, arrested the whisky in the hands of the warehouse-keepers. In a competition between Robertson & Baxter and Inglis, who maintained that by the law of England the indorsement and delivery of the warrant gave him a right to the whisky which was preferable to that of any creditor of Goldsmith doing diligence subsequently, held by a majority of the whole Court that the competition fell to be determined by the law of Scotland. Robertson & Baxter v. Inglis, March 18, 1897, p. 758.

ASSESSMENT. See Police, 6, 7, 10.

ASSIGNATION. Statute—Construction—"Assets"—Claims of damages—City of Glasgow Bank Liquidation Act, 1882.

In 1882 the Assets Company, Limited, under a private Act of Parliament, took over the outstanding assets of the City of Glasgow Bank, which had gone into liquidation in 1878. In 1896 the Assets Company brought an action against the trustees of a contributory who had, in 1879, been discharged of his liabilities to the bank upon a compromise with the liquidators, concluding for a reduction of the discharge, or for damages, on the ground that the contributory in transacting with the liquidators had fraudulently understated the amount of his property. The defenders pleaded no title to sue, maintaining that upon a sound construction of the Act such claims had not been assigned to the company. The Court repelled the plea of no title to sue. Assets Co., Limited, v. Shirres' Trustees, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 418.

ASSIGNATION—Continued.

See Lease, 3.

BANK. Savings Bank—Depositor—Action by depositor—Arbitration—Savings Banks Acts Amendment Act, 1863, sec. 48.

M brought an action against the trustees of a savings bank for payment of £50 which had been deposited in her name, and which she alleged the officials of the bank had paid away upon a forged order to another person. The defenders denied that the order was forged, or that they were responsible even if it was. They pleaded that the action was excluded by the arbitration clause (sec. 48) of the Savings Banks Acts Amendment Act, 1863. At the date when the action was brought M had no funds at her credit in the books of the bank. Held that the action being founded upon the contract of deposit involved a question between the bank and a depositor in the sense of the statute, which fell to be decided by arbitration. Melrose v. Trustees for Edinburgh Savings Bank, Feb. 2, 1897, p. 483.

BANKRUPTCY. Illegal Preference—Lease—Tenant possessing a farm and stock under contract of service—Landlord taking possession on death of servant—Act 1696, c. 5—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 110.

1. A landlord, in an agreement with G., his ground officer, agreed to give him possession of a farm from Whitsunday 1887 rent free as part of his salary, and also to hand over to him the horses and farm implements and corn crop of 1887 without payment, it being stipulated that a valuation should be made in the same way as if G. were an incoming tenant, and that a similar valuation should be made when the arrangement terminated, and any difference paid by landlord or tenant as the case might be. The agreement was yearly, and might be terminated at any Whitsunday on four months' notice. On G.'s death (on 14th May 1895) the landlord took possession of the farm, and sold the horses, &c. Within seven months after G.'s death his estates were sequestrated, and thereafter the trustee in the sequestration brought an action calling upon the landlord to account for the value of the horses, implements, and crop. He averred that at the date of his death G. was notour bankrupt. Held that the contract was terminated by G.'s death, and that the landlord thereupon became entitled to take possession of the farm and of the horses, implements, and crop, as proprietor thereof, and that his possession was not open to challenge either under the Act 1696, cap. 5, or section 110 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. Torrance v. Traill's Trustees, March 19, 1897, p. 837.

Illegal Preference—Sheriff—Competency—Declarator of illegal preference—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 10—The Bankruptcy and Real Securities (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 9—The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1877, sec. 8 (2).

2. Held that an action praying the Court to find a certain payment by an insolvent debtor within sixty days of bankruptcy to be null and void at common law and under the Act 1696, c. 5, and to find that the payment was an illegal preference, and to set aside the same, was competent in the Sheriff Court. M'Laren's Trustee v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, June 12, 1897, p. 920.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Illegal Preference—Title to Sue—Trustee under voluntary trust-deed.

3. Held that a trustee under a voluntary trust-deed for behoof of creditors has no title to sue an action to set aside an illegal preference granted by the debtor to the prejudice of prior creditors who have assented to the trust-deed. M'Laren's Trustee v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, June 12, 1897, p. 920.
4. Held (1) that a prior creditor who alleges that he has been prejudiced by his debtor making a payment after insolvency, and within sixty days of his bankruptcy, has a title to sue for declarator that the payment is null, but (2) not to sue for payment either to himself or to a trustee for creditors. M'Laren's Trustee v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, June 12, 1897, p. 920.

Illegal and Fraudulent Preference—Retiring an accommodation bill before maturity—Act 1696, c. 5.

5. A bank discounted a bill for the drawer, who informed the bank that it had been accepted for his accommodation. Before the bill matured the drawer paid the bill in cash, and the bill was delivered to him. At the time of the payment the drawer was insolvent, and he became bankrupt within sixty days thereafter. In an action brought against the bank by a prior creditor for declarator that the payment was illegal, it was proved that as at the time of the payment the bank had no knowledge of the drawer's insolvency, and had no reasonable ground for believing that he was insolvent, and that the retiring a bill before maturity was within the ordinary course of a banker's business. Held that the payment was not an illegal preference within the meaning of the Act 1696, c. 5, and was not a fraudulent preference at common law. M'Laren's Trustee v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, June 12, 1897, p. 920.

Deed in fraud of creditors—Title to Sue—Title of trustee in foreign bankruptcy—Reduction.

6. Where a domiciled Scotsman carrying on business in a foreign country is declared bankrupt by the Courts of that country, and the administration of his estates is transferred to an official with the right to sue on behalf of the creditors, the Courts of this country will recognise his title to sue in this country. Obers v. Paton's Trustees, March 17, 1897, p. 719.

Deed in fraud of creditors—Spes successionis.

7. A bankrupt is not entitled to do any act in relation to a spes successionis to the prejudice of his creditors. Obers v. Paton's Trustees, March 17, 1897, p. 719.

Trust for creditors—Adoption of lease by trustee—Deed of assignation and renunciation—Liability for rent.

8. Deeds of assignation and renunciation on a construction of which it was held that the trustee for the creditors of a farmer had possessed the farm as tenant under the lease, and that he was personally liable for the rent of the year during which he had possessed. Moncreiffe v. Ferguson, Oct. 24, 1896, p. 47.

Trust for creditors—Lease—Compensation.

9. By the lease of a farm, the landlord, in the event of the tenant becoming insolvent, had the option to terminate the lease, and in the event of his exercising this option he was bound to settle with the tenant as if the lease had naturally expired. Under the lease the tenant became entitled on its termination to the value of certain meliorations on buildings taken over by him from the previous tenant as the same might be fixed by arbitration, and the general regulations of the estate, which were incorporated in the lease, inter alia, provided,—“The outgoing and incoming tenants must settle between themselves regarding the payment of crop, manure, and other things, without any responsibility on the heritor, unless the heritor chooses to interfere." The tenant having become insolvent and having granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, the landlord terminated the lease and let the farm to a new tenant. Thereafter the landlord and the trustee entered into a reference to have the value of the meliorations on buildings and of the manure, &c., fixed. Under this reference the value was fixed at £189, 1s. The trustee having brought an action against the landlord for payment of this sum, the landlord pleaded compensation in respect of a sum of £197, 12s. 6d., being the amount of arrears of rent due by the tenant. The trustee maintained that the plea of compensation was ill founded in respect (1) that the landlord having the option under the lease of either leaving the tenant to settle with the incoming tenant for meliorations, manure, &c., or of himself settling with the tenant, the agreement under which he elected the latter course was to be regarded as constituting an obligation incurred to the trustee subsequently to the tenant's insolvency, to which the doctrine of compensation was inapplicable; and in respect (2) that the landlord having (as the trustee averred) acceded to the trust, the trustee was vested in the tenant's right to the manure, &c., free of any obligation to compensate. Held that both claims arose out of the contract of lease, and that the plea of compensation fell to be sustained. Jaffray's Trustee v. Milne, Feb. 26, 1897, p. 602.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Trust for creditors—Liability of trustee for payment of invalid claim.

10. Held that a trustee for behoof of creditors who had in good faith, but against the protest of the truster, and so precipitately that the latter had no opportunity of interdicting him, paid a claim which was afterwards held to be invalid, was liable to make good the sum so paid away by him. Buttercase & Geddie's Trustee v. Geddie, July 16, 1897, p. 1128.

Sequestration—Recall—Declarator that sequestration at an end—Nobile Officium.

11. The estates of a deceased person were sequestrated, and an abbreviate of the sequestration was recorded in the Register of Inhibitions, and an abbreviate of the trustee's confirmation recorded in the Register of Sequestrations. The estates consisted in part of a heritable property burdened with a bond and disposition in security. This property was vested in the bankrupt's testamentary trustees, and they having paid to the trustee the value of the reversion obtained a discharge of all claims at his instance. The sequestrated estates were then divided and the trustee was discharged. The testamentary trustees thereafter presented a petition to the Court praying for recall of the sequestration, or otherwise for declarator that the sequestration was at an end and the trustees reinvested in the property in question, and to appoint and grant warrant authorising the judgment to be entered in the Register of Sequestrations and in the Register of Inhibitions. The Court, holding that it was inappropriate to recall a sequestration which had run its course, granted the alternative prayer of the petition. Macleish's Trustees, Nov. 14, 1896, p. 151.

Sequestration—Defect in statement of concurring creditor's claim—Petition for recall—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 21 and 49.

12. In a petition by a debtor for sequestration the affidavit of the concurring creditor described the debt due to him as "being the amount contained in an account for goods supplied by the deponent" to the debtor. The relative account contained forty-eight items of varying amounts and under different dates. The sole description in the case of each item was "Goods." The Court granted a petition for recall of the sequestration on the ground that the account produced by the concurring creditor was not sufficiently specific in its terms to satisfy the requirements of the Bankruptcy Act. Riddell v. Galbraith, Oct. 27, 1896, p. 51.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Sequestration—Title to Sue—Trustee—Expenses.

13. A, who had as trustee on a sequestrated estate raised an action and obtained from a Lord Ordinary a decree for expenses, was afterwards removed from office. The defender having reclaimed, and the new trustee having declined to sist himself, A presented an application to be sisted on the ground that he had an interest in the question of expenses. The Court refused the application. Mackenzie v. Fowler, July 13, 1897, p. 1080.

Accession to composition agreement—Writ—Writ of Agent.

14. Held that the accession by a creditor to a composition agreement may be proved by the writ of his duly authorised agent. Henry v. Strachan & Spence, July 10, 1897, p. 1045.

Report by trustee not obtainable—Nobile Officium—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 146—Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 5.

15. Where in consequence of the death of the trustee in a cessio the bankrupt was not able to obtain the statutory report with a view to his discharge, the Court remitted the case to the Accountant of Court for his report. Mackay, Dec. 8, 1896, p. 210.

See Expenses, 14—Inhibition, 1.

Prosecutions for Fraudulent Bankruptcy, see Justiciary Cases, 12, 25 to 29.

BARONY. See Superior and Vassal, 2, 4, 5.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. Blank Acceptance—Authority to fill in name of third party as drawer—Accommodation Bill—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, secs. 20 and 29.

1. Russell, for the accommodation of Knox, handed to Knox a bill stamp with his (Russell's) acceptance written across the face of it, but otherwise blank. It was understood between the parties that a bill on Russell for £189, 13s. at four months should be completed on the acceptance, but there was no agreement that Knox himself should necessarily be the drawer. Knox, for facility of discount, procured the bill to be drawn for the agreed on sum and at the agreed on usance, by the Banknock Company, of which he was managing director, and to whom he was indebted. The company discounted the bill with a bank, and applied the proceeds in reducing a debt due by Knox to them. Knox having become bankrupt, and having failed to retire the bill, it was retired by Russell, who brought an action of relief against the Banknock Company. Held that the pursuer had no right of recourse against the defenders. Russell v. Banknock Coal Co., Limited, July 1, 1897, p. 1009.

Bankruptcy—Illegal Preference—Act 1696, c. 5.

2. Retiring an accommodation bill before maturity. M'Laren's Trustees v. National Bank of Scotland, June 12, 1897, p. 920.

Process—Summons—Action founded on bill of exchange—Court of Session Act, 1850, section 1, and schedule A—A. S. 31st October 1850.

3. Held (by Lord Kincairney, Ordinary) that where an action is founded on a bill of exchange, the bill must be set forth in the conclusions of the summons. Davis v. Cadman, Jan. 13, 1897, p. 297.

See Jurisdiction, 2.

BOARD OF TRADE. See Ship, 4.

BREACH OF PROMISE TO MARRY. See Husband and Wife, 1.

BURGH. Election of Police Commissioners—Casus improvisus—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 17.

1. A burgh administered by twelve police commissioners elected by the whole burgh was divided into four wards in 1895, and in 1896 an election fell to take place in each of the four wards for the purpose of filling the places of the four senior commissioners, who were bound to retire from office in that year. Prior to the date of the election a fifth commissioner intimated his resignation, and, as he had been elected by the burgh and not by a ward, the election of his successor did not fall to any particular ward. The commissioners applied to the Court for an order under sec. 17 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. The Court ordered the election of an additional commissioner by the First Ward. M'Callum v. Lochhead, Oct. 17, 1896, p. 26.

BURGH—Continued.

Extension of boundaries—Confirmation of resolution to extend—Expenses—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 11, 12, and 13.

2. Held that under section 12 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, the Sheriff or the Court of Session, must either confirm the resolution of magistrates to extend the boundaries of the burgh simpliciter or refuse confirmation, and that therefore it is not competent to confirm the resolution as regards part of the area resolved to be added, and to refuse confirmation as regards the rest of the area.

Held further that in an application for confirmation of a resolution of magistrates under section 12, it is the duty of the Sheriff, or the Court, to consider all reasonable grounds of objection to the confirmation, including objections based on the number of dwelling-houses in the area proposed to be added and the amount of its population.

Circumstances in which the Court in a petition under section 13 of the Act, for recall of a deliverance of the Sheriff confirming a resolution of magistrates to extend the boundaries of a burgh, recalled the deliverance of the Sheriff, and refused to confirm the resolution.

The Court refused a motion by the petitioners for expenses, Lord Young observing that the proceedings were not a litigation. White v. Magistrates of Rutherglen, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 446.

Revision of boundaries of wards—Proof of expediency—Sheriff—Burgh Police Act, 1892, secs. 11 and 13.

3. Held that the power given to the Sheriff by section 11 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, is administrative, and not judicial, and that he is not entitled to grant an application to alter the boundaries of a burgh in respect of no opposition, but only if tota re perspecta he considers it expedient to do so. Lindsay v. Magistrates of Leith, May 22, 1897, p. 867.

Resolution regarding salary of official—Jus quæsitum.

4. At a meeting the Commissioners of a burgh resolved to increase by £10 the salary of their sanitary inspector, but no official intimation of the resolution was made to him. At a subsequent meeting they cancelled their former resolution. In an action against them by the sanitary inspector, held that the pursuer had no jus quæsitum under the resolution, as it had not been intimated to him. Burr v. Commissioners of Bo'ness, Nov. 13, 1896, p. 148.

Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction—Public Street—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 286 and 290.

5. A proprietor of vacant ground in Glasgow presented a petition to the Dean of Guild for the lining of a street, stating that he intended to form a public street. After the Master of Works had been cited, the petitioner obtained a warrant from the Dean of Guild to form the intended street "as a public street." When the street was formed he presented a petition to the Dean of Guild craving him to declare the street a public street. The petition, which was opposed by the Master of Works as incompetent, was granted. The Master of Works having appealed, the Court dismissed the petition as incompetent, holding that the Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction under sec. 290 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, to declare a street a public street, but only under sec. 286, on a joint application by the proprietor and the Master of Works. Dixon's Trustees v. Whyte, March 4, 1897, p. 639.

BURGH—Continued.

Dean of Guild—Street—Taking down and re-erecting buildings—Height—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 290 and 364.

6. In 1872 a proprietor obtained a warrant from the Dean of Guild for the lining of a street on an application in which he stated that the maximum height of the intended buildings was 60 feet. Held that the lining did not determine the height of the buildings for all time, and did not make it incompetent for the Dean of Guild in 1896 to authorise the erection in the street of buildings of a greater height than 60 feet. Waddell v. Whyte, March 17, 1897, p. 677.

Dean of Guild—Alteration of existing building—Provision for light and ventilation—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 167.

7. Where the plans for the alteration of a building shewed that the alteration would have the effect of improving the light and ventilation of the premises, held that the Dean of Guild Court were not entitled, under sec. 167 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, to refuse a warrant on the ground that they were not satisfied that the plans provided suitably for light and ventilation of the building. Macgregor v. Magistrates of Leith, June 18, 1897, p. 971.

Dean of Guild—Alteration of existing buildings—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, sec. 49.

8. In a petition for warrant to add to an existing building, held that the light and ventilation as to which the Dean of Guild required to be satisfied were the light and ventilation of the additional building for the erection of which warrant was craved, and that the Dean of Guild was not entitled to refuse a warrant on the ground that the proposed addition would interfere with the light and ventilation of the existing buildings. Saltoun v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, March 19, 1897, p. 832.

Dean of Guild—Alteration of existing buildings—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, sec. 50—Edinburgh Improvement and Municipal and Police Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. c. cliv.).

9. In 1893 the proprietor of a tenement used for business purposes, situated in Queen Street, Edinburgh, obtained warrant from the Dean of Guild for the erection of a hall and buildings accessory thereto on an open space behind the street tenement. In 1896 the proprietor applied for authority to erect a room to be used as a cloak-room in connection with the hall above part of the buildings erected under the warrant previously granted by the Dean of Guild. The Magistrates of Edinburgh opposed the petition, on the ground that the proposed addition to the height of the buildings on the back-ground would prejudicially affect the light and ventilation of the street tenement. The Dean of Guild refused to grant the warrant craved. On appeal held that the provisions of section 50 did not apply, in respect that the application was neither for warrant to erect a new building nor for warrant to convert a dwelling-house into business premises. Saltoun v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, March 19, 1897, p. 832.

See Church—Police.

BYELAW. See Fishings, 1.

CARRIAGE. See Railway, 8, 9.

CAUTIONER. Suspension.

Personal liability of cautioner for expenses in a suspension brought by a trustee. Stewart v. Forbes, July 15, 1897, p. 1112.

CESSIO. Discharge—Report by trustees not obtainable—Nobile Officium—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 146—Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 5.

Where in consequence of the death of the trustee in a cessio the bankrupt was not able to obtain the statutory report with a view to his discharge, the Court remitted the case to the Accountant of Court for his report. Mackay, Dec. 8, 1896, p. 210.

CESSIO—Continued.

CHARITABLE AND EDUCATIONAL BEQUESTS AND TRUSTS. Alteration of scheme framed by Educational Endowments Commissioners.

Competency of considering, under a petition for the alteration of a scheme, an amendment of the scheme not within the scope of the petition. School Board of Crieff, July 14, 1897, p. 1096.

CHURCH. Stipend—Competent and legal stipend—Amount—Burgh.

1. The magistrates, councillors, and freemen of a burgh were bound by decree of disjunction and erection of a parish to provide the minister serving the cure with a legal and competent stipend, in addition to a manse, cow's grass, and allowance for Communion expenses. In an action by the minister the Court, having regard to the number of the population, the duties entailed on the minister by the character of the parish, and the emoluments of neighbouring charges, fixed £300 as the amount of the stipend to be provided by the magistrates, councillors, and freemen. Rainie v. Magistrates of Newton-on-Ayr, Feb. 26, 1897, p. 606.

Parish partly landward partly burghal—Repairs to church—Liability for expense of repairs—Real or valued rent—Custom of parish—Res judicata—Burgh.

2. By decree pronounced in 1761 in an action of declarator brought by the heritors of Kinghorn against the burgh of Kinghorn, it was found and declared "that the community of the burgh of Kinghorn are entitled to retain possession of that proportion of the area of the kirk of Kinghorn presently possessed by them; and that the heritors of the landward parish are also entitled to retain possession of that proportion of the area of the said kirk presently possessed by them . . . and of consent found, and hereby find, that the community of the burgh of Kinghorn has been in use to pay one half of the repairs of the kirk, manse, and office-houses. Therefore that they are liable in the one-half of the present repairs and also in the half of all the repairs on said kirk, manse, and office-houses in time coming." After this decree the burgh paid one half of the cost of repairs on the church down to 1855. In that year the burgh refused to pay one half of the cost of a new manse, and under a compromise with the heritors were assessed in one-fifth only. In 1856, 1869, and 1878, a similar assessment was levied on the burgh in connection with repairs on the church and manse. In all these instances the entry made on the assessment-roll was "without prejudice to the right of parties in future similar cases." In 1894 a question having arisen as to the rebuilding or repairing of the church, the Sheriff found that the church could be repaired, and directed the necessary work to be done. The work executed on the church was of a very extensive character, the expense amounting to about four-fifths of the estimated cost of building a new church. In a question as to the mode of assessment for the expense, held that there had been no dereliction of the rights and liabilities determined by the decree of 1761; that that decree determined the rule of liability for the repairs of the church so long as the then existing fabric continued; that the Sheriff's judgment being final, the work done was to be regarded as repairs only, and not as rebuilding, and that accordingly the assessment fell to be levied to the extent of one half on the burgh of Kinghorn, and to the extent of the other half on the old valued rent heritors, according to their valued rents. Heritors of Kinghorn v. Magistrates of Kinghorn, March 12, 1897, p. 704.

COLLEGE. See Revenue, 5.

COLLISION. See Ship, 2.

COMMISSIONERS. See Fishings, 1.

COMPANY. Shares—Prospectus—Application for shares “on faith” of the prospectus—Fraud—Proof—Onus—Companies Act, 1867, sec. 38.

1. A person applied for shares in a joint stock company on a form which requested allotment “upon the terms of the prospectus,” and shares were allotted to him. In an action brought by his representatives against the directors for declarator that the prospectus was fraudulent within the meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, in respect that it did not specify a certain agreement, the pursuers, to shew that the deceased had applied for the shares on the faith of the prospectus, founded on the terms of his application, and proved that the prospectus had been widely advertised in Glasgow, where the deceased was living. There was no direct evidence that the deceased had read the prospectus. The defenders proved that the deceased had applied for the shares in reliance on the advice of one of the directors who was a personal friend. Held that the pursuers had failed to prove that the shares had been applied for on the faith of the prospectus, and that section 38 did not apply. M’Morland’s Trustees v. Fraser, Oct. 29, 1896, p. 65.

Shares—Application for—Fraud—Concealment of material facts by director who was also vendor to company.

2. In an action raised by the representatives of A, a deceased coalmaster against one of the directors of a colliery company, which had gone into liquidation, for damages on the ground that the deceased had been induced to take shares in the company by fraudulent representation and concealment on the part of the defender, held, after a proof, that there had been no fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment on the part of the defender. M’Morland’s Trustees v. Fraser, Oct. 29, 1896, p. 65.

Debenture—Insurance of debenture in mortgage company.

3. “Failure to pay” debenture in the sense of the policy—Liquidation of insurance company prior to maturity of mortgage. Liquidators of Employers Company of Great Britain, Limited, v. Benton, June 9, 1897, p. 908.

Debenture—Agreement to pay share of profits to trustee as a sinking fund to secure debentures—Interest of sinking fund.

4. A company by an agreement entered into with a trustee for future debenture-holders became bound each year “to accumulate as a sinking fund in the hands of” the trustee a proportion of its free annual profits for securing and paying the debentures, the trustee being authorised to invest the trust funds in his hands from time to time. Held that the interest derived from the funds so invested by the trustee did not fall to be credited to the company as part of its annual profits, but that the trustee was bound to accumulate it with the funds forming the sinking fund. Arizona Copper Co., Limited, v. London Scottish American Trust, Limited, March 5, 1897, p. 658.

Income or Capital.

5. Realisation of investments—Income in the sense of the Income-Tax Acts. Assets Co., Limited, v. Inland Revenue, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 678.

Reduction of Capital—“Capital lost or unrepresented by available assets”—Companies Act, 1867, secs. 9 to 19—Companies Act, 1877, secs. 3 and 4.

6. A company registered as a company limited by shares under the Companies Acts, and which under its articles of association had power to reduce its capital and to accept the surrender of its shares, passed a special resolution to reduce its capital by permanently cancelling certain fully paid-up shares belonging to two shareholders who had agreed to the cancellation in order to recoup the company against a loss resulting from the misappropriation of the funds of the company by one of its officials. The company having presented a petition praying the Court to confirm the resolution and the proposed reduction of capital and to dispense with the addition of the words "and reduced" to the company's name, the Court, after a remit for inquiry and a report, granted the prayer of the petition. Banknock Coal Co., Limited, Jan. 30, 1897, p. 476.

COMPANY—Continued.

Winding-up—Objection to intimation of petition for winding-up—Companies Act, 1862, secs. 79 and 80.

7. Circumstances in which objections by a limited company to intimation of a petition by a debenture-holder for the judicial winding-up of the company, which was in course of being wound up voluntarily with a view to reconstruction, on the ground that the intimation would be injurious to the interest of the company, repelled. Wotherspoons v. Brescia Mining and Metallurgical Co., Limited, Dec. 5, 1896, p. 207.

Winding-up—Reduction of compromises between liquidators and contributories—"Assets."

8. Held that under the City of Glasgow Bank Liquidation Act, 1882, the Assets Company, Limited, had a title to bring an action against the trustees of a contributory in the liquidation of the bank, who had been discharged of his liabilities upon a compromise with the liquidators, concluding for reduction of the discharge, or alternatively for damages, on the ground that the contributory, in transacting with the liquidators, had fraudulently understated the amount of his property.

Proof before answer of general averments of fraudulent understatement of property allowed. Assets Co., Limited, v. Shirres' Trustees, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 418.

See Revenue, 4.

COMPENSATION. See Bankruptcy, 9—Expenses, 17—Process, 4.

COMPROMISE. See Executor, 3—Judicial Factor, 1.

CONDITION. See Contract, 1—Insurance, 3, 5—Lease, 15—Succession, 14.

CONFIDENTIALITY. See Insurance, 4.

CONTRACT. Constitution—Offer and Acceptance—Condition—Mora.

1. In an action for implement of an offer to execute the mason work required for the erection of a house in Aberdeen made by the defender to the pursuer's architect on 10th June, and accepted by the pursuer on 21st June, the defender maintained that there was no concluded contract, in respect (1) that his offer had not been accepted within seven days as provided by one of a number of "conditions of tendering" agreed to by the architects and builders of Aberdeen; (2) and that in any view there had been undue delay in accepting his offer. After a proof held (1) that the so-called "conditions" were not to be regarded as implied conditions in building contracts in Aberdeen, but rather as rules for the guidance of architects; and (2) that the offer had been accepted without undue delay, and was binding. Murray v. Rennie & Angus, June 18, 1897, p. 965.

Constitution—Fraud—Damages or restitutio in integrum.

2. Agreement to give credit to third party induced by fraud—Loss resulting from advances made during a course of years—Right of party who has made the advances to be relieved of the contract and restored against the loss by the party who has induced him to enter into the agreement. Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons, Dec. 3, 1896, p. 198.

Construction.

3. Agreement to transfer engineer's business with plant in consideration of payment of annuity—Whether to be understood as a lease of the premises containing the plant. Thomson v. Thomson, Dec. 18, 1896, p. 269.

CONTRACT—Continued.

Construction—Obligation not to "take legal steps" to recover debt.

4. A, who had been financing B, declined to make further advances, but with the view of assisting B to get advances from T, sent to T a letter agreeing (1) that he, A, should "not take legal steps against B within seven years from this date to enforce payment of the balance" due to him; (2) that during that time he would not sell or foreclose mortgages held by him over B's property; (3) that he would not hold against B's debt any goods sent by B for sale which had been purchased with T's money. Held that A's letter did not preclude him during the currency of the seven years from recovering payment of B's debt by other means than those specified in the letter. Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons, Dec. 3, 1896, p. 198.

Construction—Dynamo.

5. Contract to supply dynamo. Electric Construction Co., Limited, v. Hurry & Young, Jan. 14, 1897, p. 312.

Condition—Forfeiture—Drunkenness.

6. Lease of public-house—"Doing anything which may endanger" licence. Noble v. Hart, Nov. 24, 1896, p. 174.

Implement—Executory Contract—Fraud—Process—Remit.

7. Contract for execution of drainage work—Action alleging fraudulent execution of the work, and praying for remit to man of skill to report, and for execution of such work as he might report to be necessary—Competency of action. Magistrates of Kilmarnock v. Reid, Jan. 22, 1897, p. 388.

See Servitude, 1.

CONVERSION. See Succession, 2.

CORPORATION. See Superior and Vassal, 1.

COUNTY COUNCIL. District Committee—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1869.

Lands taken by County Council—Erection of hospital by District Committee on lands—Competency of claim against District Committee for compensation. District Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanark v. Marshall, Nov. 10, 1896, p. 139.

See Process, 39.

CROFTERS HOLDINGS ACTS. Valuation Acts—Fair Rent—Crofter Proprietor—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, sec. 6.

A crofter, the rent of whose farm had been fixed at a fair rent by the Crofters Commission, purchased his holding. The Assessor, assuming that the fair rent represented only the landlord's interest in the croft, added thereto, in fixing the valuation, a sum representing the annual value of permanent improvements on the holding. Held that the valuation was right. Mackay v. Assessor for Sutherland, March 17, 1897, p. 737.

CROWN. See Superior and Vassal, 2 to 5.

CUSTOM. See Church, 2.

DEAN OF GUILD. See Burgh, 5 to 9.

DECLINATURE. See Administration of Justice, 1.

DECREE. See Fishings, 1—Process, 16 to 19.

DELIVERY. See Writ, 2.

DENTIST. See Justiciary Cases, 30.

DESTINATION. See Succession, 4, 5.

DILIGENCE. See Arrestment—Inhibition—Poinding.

DILIGENCE FOR RECOVERY OF DOCUMENTS. See Process, 23 to 26.

DISCHARGE. Absolute or revocable.

1. Discharge by daughters of rights under their parents' marriage-contract held to be irrevocable, although it involved the gratuitous surrender of right to absolute payment in fee, and acceptance of a provision in liferent and fee to children. Neish's Trustees v. Neish, Jan. 13, 1897, p. 306.

Absolute or conditional—Discharge of legitim.

2. A bankrupt executed a deed of discharge whereby, on the narrative that he had received various advances of money from his father, and that it was reasonable and proper that "in respect of such advances" he should execute the discharge after written, he exonerated and discharged his father, his heirs and executors, of any legitim which he could claim through the death of his father. Held that the deed was not to be construed as conditional upon the father's claim for repayment of the advances being discharged, but was a gratuitous discharge of the son's right to legitim. Obers v. Paton's Trustees, March 17, 1897, p. 719.

Agent and Client—Accounting—Settled Account—Trust—Beneficiary's right to taxation of business account of trust after settlement.

3. A beneficiary having right to a share of residue under a trust-settlement granted a discharge to the trustees, and afterwards, on discovering the sum paid to the trustees' law-agent for law expenses and commission, raised an action of accounting against the trustees for the purpose of having the law-agent's account taxed, and any overcharge restored to the estate—the pursuer alleging that the charges were excessive. Held that the pursuer was not precluded from raising the action by the discharge. M'Farlane v. M'Farlane's Trustees, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 574.

DIVORCE. See Husband and Wife, 4, 5.

DOMICILE. See Husband and Wife, 6.

ELECTION LAW. Franchise—Failure to pay poor-rates—Partial payment of consolidated rates without specific appropriation to poor-rate—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 3.

1. The claim of a person to be enrolled as a parliamentary voter was objected to on the ground that he had not paid the poor-rates due by him at the 15th of May preceding. In a case stated it appeared that the claimant had been assessed for 2s. 8d. of consolidated parish rates, of which 1s. 6d. was poor-rate, and that he had paid 2s. to account, but that he had not appropriated this payment to poor-rate. It was not stated that the collector had so appropriated it. Held that the claimant had not paid the poor-rate, and was not entitled to be enrolled. Bell v. Galt, Jan. 19, 1897, p. 374.

Franchise—Lodger Franchise—Evidence of value—Valuation-roll—Declaration as evidence of qualification—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 4.—Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885, sec. 14.

2. A person claimed to be registered as a lodger in respect of the occupation of two rooms and a surgery in a house. The rent for the furnished lodgings payable by the claimant was 8s. a week, amounting to £10, 16s. per annum. An objection was taken that the yearly rent of the whole house (as shewn by the Valuation-roll) was £5, and that the value of the lodgings, which formed only part of the house, could not therefore be of the clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10. The Sheriff, proceeding on the rent actually paid for the lodgings, held that as matter of fact they were of the statutory value, and admitted the claim. The Court refused an appeal, holding that the entry in the Valuation-roll was only an element in the proof, and that the Sheriff was not thereby precluded from forming his own judgment on the value of the rooms occupied by the claimant, and that there was no ground in law for interfering with the Sheriff's decision on the question of fact. Kellie v. Little, Jan. 19, 1897, p. 379.

ELECTION LAW—Continued.

Franchise—Service Franchise—Representation of the People Act, 1884, sec. 3.

3. A constable residing in police barracks had the exclusive use and occupation of a room, of which he kept the key. He slept in the room, and when off duty was entitled to use it and to receive visitors in it. Separate common rooms were provided in the barracks for meals and recreations. The right of the constable to the room was contingent on his remaining in the force, and the barracks were subject to the control of the chief-constable, who might at any time remove the constable from the barracks, order him to change his bedroom or keep certain hours, order him to give up the key of his room on ceasing to occupy it, forbid him to receive visitors in the room, and order him to open the door of his room so as to let any person in authority enter. Held that the constable inhabited the "dwelling-house" in the sense of section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, and that the "dwelling-house" was not inhabited by any person under whom he served, and that therefore he was entitled to be registered. Wallace v. Borrie, Jan. 19, 1897, p. 376.

Appeal—Jurisdiction—Municipal Roll—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 22.

4. Held that the Registration Appeal Court has no jurisdiction under sec. 22 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, to entertain an appeal from a judgment of the Sheriff in adjusting the list of voters for a municipal election. Wood v. Laing, Jan. 19, 1897, p. 382.

Election Petition—Return of election expenses—Failure to make timeous and true return—Petition for authorised excuse—Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, sec. 34.

5. Opinions that the Court has no jurisdiction to entertain an application by a candidate under sec. 34 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, for an authorised excuse for failure to make a timeous and true return of election expenses unless the petitioner admits in his petition that he has contravened the statute. Clark v. Sutherland, Dec. 2, 1896, p. 183.
6. Where a candidate applies under sec. 34 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, for an authorised excuse for failure to make a timeous and true return of election expenses, any elector in the constituency has a title to appear and oppose the application. Clark v. Sutherland, Dec. 2, 1896, p. 183.
7. In a petition by a Member of Parliament, who had acted as his own election agent, for an authorised excuse for failure, inter alia, to enclose certain vouchers with the return of his expenses, and to insert in the declaration the amount of his expenses in the election, held, after a proof, that the failure was due to inadvertence, and not to want of good faith, and excuse allowed. Clark v. Sutherland, March 18, 1897, p. 821.
8. It is incompetent to amend a petition by a candidate at a parliamentary election, for an authorised excuse for errors in his return of election expenses, by adding a statement of an additional error requiring an excuse, without notice being given to the constituency. Clark v. Sutherland, March 18, 1897, p. 821.
9. Held that it is competent for a person opposing a petition by a candidate for an authorised excuse for certain errors in his return of election expenses to lead evidence of other errors in the return, with the view of shewing that those specified were not due to mere inadvertence. Clark v. Sutherland, March 18, 1897, p. 821.

ELECTION LAW—Continued.

EXECUTOR. Confirmation—Competition—Testament—"My heir."

1. A holograph will provided, inter alia,—"My cousin Thomas Forrest is to be my heir." Various legacies were then left. Mrs Jerdon, the testator's sister, craved to be appointed executrix-dative qua next of kin of the testatrix. Thomas Forrest, who was thirty-eight years of age and had lived with the testatrix since he was three years old, craved confirmation as executor-nominate, or as executor-dative qua general donee and universal legatory of the deceased. The Court preferred the claim of Mrs Jerdon, on the ground that it was not clear from the terms of the will that the testatrix had conferred on Thomas Forrest the character claimed by him. Jerdon v. Forrest, Jan. 23, 1897, p. 393.

Title to Sue—Declarator of marriage—Breach of promise and seduction—Process—Summons—Conclusions.

2. A woman brought an action against a man concluding for declarator of an irregular marriage, "but if it shall be found that the pursuer is not married to the defender, then and in that case" for £3000 as damages for breach of promise and seduction. The pursuer pleaded that decree of declarator ought to be pronounced, "or alternatively" that decree ought to be pronounced "in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons." While the action was in dependence the pursuer died, and her executor craved leave to be sisted as pursuer, stating that he proposed to insist in the conclusion for damages only. The defender objected, on the ground that the conclusion for damages was in terms conditional on decree of absolvitor in the declarator being pronounced, and that the executor was not in titulo to move for declarator. Held that the conclusions were truly alternative, and that the executor was entitled to be sisted to the effect of pursuing the conclusion for damages. Green or Borthwick v. Borthwick, Dec. 8, 1894, p. 211.

Settlement of action by majority of executors—Title of non-consenting executor to continue action.

3. Where an action on behalf of an executry estate had been raised by the executors, six in number, and the case had been settled by joint minute for five executors without the consent of the sixth, and decree of absolvitor pronounced, held that the executor who did not consent to the settlement had no title to continue the action, no unfairness on the part of the other executors being alleged. Scott v. Craig's Representatives, Jan. 29, 1897, p. 462.

EXPENSES. Awarding—Amendment of record—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

1. Circumstances in which the Court allowed the appellant in a Sheriff Court action to amend his defences, on condition that he should find caution for the sum of £30, to meet the expense of the prior proceedings in the case in the event of it turning out that he was in fault in not originally proponing the defence embodied in the proposed amendment. Paton v. M'Knight, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 554.

Awarding—Decree by default—Appeal—Reponing.

2. No appearance being made for the pursuer of an action in a Sheriff Court at a diet of debate, the Sheriff-substitute assoilzied the defender. The pursuer appealed. Held that, as a condition of being allowed to proceed with the action, the pursuer must pay the whole expenses of the defender in both Courts. M'Carthy v. Emery, Feb. 27, 1897, p. 610.

EXPENSES—Continued.Awarding—Ministerial Procedure—Extension of burgh boundaries.

3. The Court having, in a petition under section 13 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, recalled a deliverance of a Sheriff confirming a resolution of the magistrates of a burgh to extend the boundaries of the burgh and refused to confirm the resolution, further refused a motion by the successful petitioner for expenses, Lord Young observing that the proceedings were not a litigation. White v. Magistrates of Rutherglen, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 446.

Awarding—Recall of Inhibition—Refusal of debtor to discharge inhibition.

4. A creditor raised an action for payment of a debt and used inhibition on the dependence, but he acceded to a composition arrangement on his debtor's estate, and the summons was not called. He subsequently refused to discharge the inhibition on payment of the composition being tendered. In a petition at the instance of the debtor, held that he was entitled to have the inhibition discharged, and that the creditor was liable for the expenses of the application. Robertson v. Park, Dobson, & Co., Oct. 20, 1896, p. 30.

Awarding—Tender—Delay in accepting.

5. In an action of damages for personal injury, the pursuer was found liable in part of the expenses incurred between the date on which a tender was made and the date of acceptance in respect of undue delay in accepting the tender. M'Laughlin v. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, June 30, 1897, p. 992.

Awarding—Tender—Conditional Tender.

6. Question, whether an offer of a sum by the defender in an action of damages, accompanied by a declaration that the pursuers' case was unfounded and untrue, was a tender entitling the defender to expenses in the event of the offer being declined, and the sum awarded as damages being less than the sum mentioned in the offer. Thomson & Co. v. Dailly, July 20, 1897, p. 1173.

Awarding—Expense of debate on relevancy at adjustment of issues.

7. Where, at the adjustment of issues in an appeal from the Sheriff Court for jury trial, the defender objected to the relevancy of the action, and the Court repelled the objection, held that the pursuer was entitled to the expenses of the discussion. Warwick v. Caledonian Railway Co., Jan. 28, 1897, p. 429.

Procedure—Reclaiming Note—Time for objecting to Lord Ordinary's award.

8. When a party reclaiming objects to an interlocutor not only as wrong on the merits but also as wrong in finding the claimer liable in expenses, even if right on the merits, he must state his objection as to expenses in opening on the reclaiming note. Clark v. Sutherland, March 18, 1897, p. 821.

Procedure—Title to Sue—Trust.

9. A, who had as trustee on a sequestrated estate raised an action and obtained from a Lord Ordinary a decree for expenses, was afterwards removed from office. The defender having reclaimed, and the new trustee having declined to sist himself, A presented an application to be sisted on the ground that he had an interest in the question of expenses. The Court refused the application. Mackenzie v. Fowler, July 13, 1897, p. 1080.

Parties liable—Dominus Litis—Parent and Child.

10. An action of damages on account of personal injuries to a pupil boy was raised by the father of the boy "as tutor and administrator-in-law of" the boy. During the dependence of the action the boy became a minor, and thereafter an interlocutor was pronounced sisting him, "with consent and concurrence of" his father, "as his curator and administrator-in-law, as pursuer in room and in place of the said" father. The defenders having obtained a verdict, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on their motion, granted decree for expenses against the father up to the date of sisting the boy as pursuer, and against the father and the boy as pursuer, and against the father and the boy conjunctly and severally subsequent to that date. Wilkinson v. Kinneil Cannel and Coking Coal Co., Limited, July 1, 1897, p. 1001.

EXPENSES—Continued.

Parties liable—Judicial Factor—Decree against defender “as judicial factor”—Personal Liability.

11. A judicial factor upon the estate of a person deceased defended an action brought against him “as judicial factor” by a creditor of the deceased. An interlocutor was subsequently pronounced ordaining the defender “as judicial factor” to make payment to the pursuer of £159, and finding the defender “as judicial factor” liable in expenses to the pursuer. Held that the interlocutor could not be construed as imposing on the defender personal liability for expenses. Craig v. Hogg, Oct. 17, 1896, p. 6.

Parties liable—Judicial Factor.

12. In an action brought by a judicial factor in which he was unsuccessful, the Court adhered to a judgment of the Lord Ordinary finding, in the circumstances of the case, the pursuer liable in expenses, without the qualifying words “as judicial factor.” Paterson’s Judicial Factor v. Paterson’s Trustees, Feb. 4, 1897, p. 499.

Parties liable—Cautioner—Suspension—Caution for expenses—Personal liability of cautioner in suspension—Trust.

13. The complainer in a suspension of a charge upon a bill having died, his widow, one of his trustees, was at her own request sisted as complainer in his place as his “trustee,” and found caution, her cautioner becoming bound “that she shall, as trustee foresaid, pay” the sum in the bill “in full in the event of there being a sufficiency of trust funds, or rateably along with the other creditors” of the truster “in the event of his estate proving insufficient to pay his creditors in full,” and also “that payment shall be made of whatever sum the said Lords shall modify in name of damages and expenses in case of wrongous suspending.” The Court ultimately repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the complainer liable in expenses “as trustee.” In an action by the charger against the cautioner, held that whatever the liability of the complainer might be, the cautioner was liable to the charger in payment of the whole expenses. Stewart v. Forbes, July 15, 1897, p. 1112.

Parties liable—Trustee—Personal Liability.

14. In an action of multiplepounding raised in name of a trustee, a claimant objected to the condescendence of the fund in medio, in so far as the trustee took credit for a payment he had made to C, on the ground that C had no valid claim. The trustee maintained that C had a valid claim. The Court sustained the objection. Held that the trustee was personally liable in expenses to the objector, and that he was not entitled to charge his own expenses against the objector’s share of the fund in medio, reserving to the pursuer all right of relief competent to him against other persons. Buttercase & Geddie’s Trustee v. Geddie, July 16, 1897, p. 1128.

Taxation—General Finding—Objection to Auditor’s report—A. S. July 15, 1876, General Regulation 5.

15. The Court having decerned in favour of the pursuers in an action and found them entitled to expenses, the defenders, on the motion for approval of the Auditor’s report, objected that the Auditor should not have allowed the pursuers the expenses of the proof, in which they had been unsuccessful. Held that the objection came too late. Electric Construction Co., Limited, v. Hurry & Young, Feb. 6, 1897, p. 525.

Taxation—Sheriff—Action ad factum præstandum and for damages—

EXPENSES—Continued.

Conclusion ad factum præstandum dropped—A. S., 4th December 1878—General Regulations 1, 3, and 4.

16. In an action raised in a Sheriff Court for implement of a contract and for damages, the Sheriff-substitute, on the joint application of the parties before the record was closed, authorised the pursuer to accept another tender for the contract. The pursuer ultimately obtained decree in the Court of Session for payment of £11, 10s. of damages, with expenses. Held that the action having at the outset been converted into a mere action for damages, the Auditor was bound to tax the pursuer's expenses in the Sheriff Court on the lower scale, no direction having been given to the contrary. Murray v. Rennie & Angus, July 3, 1897, p. 1026.

Decree in name of Agent-disburser.

17. A, having been found liable to B in the expenses of an appeal to the Court of Session in an action which he had raised in the Sheriff Court against B, objected to decree going out in the name of the agent-disburser, on the ground that in a prior action with B, relating to the same matter, and tried in the same Sheriff Court, which was pending when the second action was brought, he had obtained decree for expenses against B which had not been paid, and which he maintained should be set off against the expenses in which he had been found liable. The decree in the prior action had been granted and extracted before the appeal in the second action came into Court. Held that the agent-disburser in the appeal was entitled to decree for expenses in his own name, in respect that at the date of the appeal the prior action was no longer pending. Paolo v. Parias, July 3, 1897, p. 1030.

Charging Order—Law-Agents and Notaries-Public (Scotland) Act, 1891 sec. 6.

18. The liferentrix under a trust-settlement having obtained a decree against the trustees ordaining them to restore to the trust-estate a sum of £104, which had been lost through the fault of the trustees, her law-agents presented an application for a charging order under the above section on the £104 for extrajudicial expenses. Owing to the payment of the principal and interest of preferable debts, the liferentrix had received nothing under her liferent, and she would receive nothing if she died before these debts had been paid off. The Court refused the application. Carruthers' Trustee v. Finlay & Wilson, Jan. 16, 1897, p. 363.

For Taxation of Law-agents' Business Accounts, see Agent and Client, 2, 3, 4.

For Election Expenses, see Election Law, 5 to 9.

FACULTIES AND POWERS. See Succession, 8, 11, 15, 18.

FREE AND LIFERENT. See Marriage-Contract, 1, 2, 3—Succession, 10 to 13.

FISHINGS. Width of cruives—Old decree regulating width—Subsequent regulation by Commissioners—Statute—Possession—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 6, subsec. 6—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, Schedule F.

1. Held that a proprietor of cruive fishings under Crown charters of ancient date, which did not specify the width of the cruives, who had since 1774 exercised his right in accordance with a finding of the Court of that date (in an action of declarator) that the cruives should not be less than 37 inches in width, was not exempted from the regulation in schedule F by the proviso in subsec. 6 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862. Duke of Fife v. George, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 549.

River—Cruives.

2. The proprietor of lands on both banks of a river and of the cruive fishings thereon, in an action of declarator in 1774, was found entitled to keep the cruives at a width of 37 inches, and to withdraw water from the river at the cruive dyke by a lade for the purpose of driving a mill, the entry of the lade to be two feet above the bed of the river. By the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, cruives were required to be four feet wide. In a special case presented in 1896, held that the proprietor was bound, when required by the Fishery Board, to widen the cruives to four feet, although it was admitted that the change would diminish the flow of water in the lade. Duke of Fife v. George, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 549.

FISHINGS—Continued.

See Justiciary Cases, 33, 34.

FOREIGN. Arrestment.

1. Competition as to right to moveables in warehouse in Scotland. Robertson & Baxter v. Inglis, March 18, 1897, p. 758.

Maritime Law.

2. The maritime law of Scotland is the same as that of England. Currie v. McKnight, Nov. 16, 1896, H. L., p. 1. See also ship "Blairmore" Co., Limited, v. Macredie, June 4, 1897 p. 893.
- Trust—Statute—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867—English Trust.*
3. The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, does not apply to English trusts. Carruthers' Trustees—Allan's Trustees, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 238.

See Bankruptcy, 6—Jurisdiction—Process, 9—Trust, 11, 12, 13.

FORESHORE. See Superior and Vassal, 2 to 5.

FORISFAMILIATION. See Poor, 2.

FRANCHISE. See Election Law.

FRAUD. Reduction—Restitutio in integrum—Relevancy—General averments of fraud—Mora.

1. The City of Glasgow Bank went into liquidation in 1878, and in 1879 A, one of the contributories, settled with the liquidators, and was discharged of his liabilities to the bank. In 1896 the Assets Company, which had taken over the assets of the bank, brought an action against A's testamentary trustees concluding for reduction of the discharge, or, alternatively, for damages. The pursuers averred that A had fraudulently concealed from the liquidators items belonging to him which the pursuers specifically mentioned, and in addition "other assets belonging to him and money in his possession to the extent of at least £40,000." The defenders pleaded (1) that the reductive conclusion was incompetent, in respect that restitutio in integrum was impossible; and (2) that the general averment of fraudulent concealment was irrelevant for want of specification. The Court allowed a proof before answer. Assets Co., Limited, v. Shirres' Trustees, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 418.

Alleged fraudulent execution of executory contract.

2. Competency of remitting, without consent of parties, to a man of skill to report as to alleged fraudulent failure properly to execute certain drainage work, and thereafter decerning for the execution (at the cost of the contractor) of such work as the reporter might find to be defective. Magistrates of Kilmarnock v. Reid, Jan. 22, 1897, p. 388.

Contract induced by fraud of third party.

3. Question, whether a person, who has been induced to enter into a contract by the fraud of a third person, is entitled to be relieved of the contract by the third party, or is only entitled to damages. Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons, Dec. 3, 1896, p. 198.

See Company, 1, 2.

FRAUDULENT BANKRUPTCY. See Justiciary Cases, 25 to 29.

GROUND-ANNUAL. See Superior and Vassal, 9.

GUILD (DEAN OF). See Burgh, 5 to 9.

HARBOUR. Liability of Harbour Trustees—Ship injured by storm while lying in berth assigned by harbour-master.

1. In an action of damages by the owner of a steamship against Harbour Trustees, on the ground that the harbour-master had wrongfully directed the removal of the vessel to a berth which was known to be unsafe, held that the damage was due to the extraordinary violence of the storm, and not to any fault on the part of the harbour-master in fixing the berth, and that the defenders were not liable. Niven v. Ayr Harbour Trustees, June 4, 1897, p. 883.

Harbour Rates—Real or Heritable Security—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, sec. 3 (b), 10 and 12.

2. A curator bonis lent a sum to Greenock Harbour Trustees, a corporation consisting of the Magistrates and Council, and nine elected trustees, on a debenture, in which they assigned to the creditor "the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust." Held that the investment was not on real security nor on a debenture granted by a municipal corporation in the sense of the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884. Cowan's Trustees v. Ferrie's Curator Bonis, Feb. 26, 1897, p. 590.

HERITABLE AND MOVEABLE. See Succession, 2.

HERITORS. See Church, 2.

HOMOLOGATION. See Minor and Pupil, 4.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. Constitution of marriage—Declarator of marriage—Breach of promise and seduction—Title to Sue—Executor—Process—Summons.

1. A woman brought an action against a man concluding for declarator of an irregular marriage, "but if it shall be found that the pursuer is not married to the defender, then and in that case" for £3000 as damages for breach of promise and seduction. The pursuer pleaded that decree of declarator ought to be pronounced, "or alternatively" that decree ought to be pronounced "in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons." While the action was in dependence the pursuer died, and her executor craved leave to be sisted as pursuer, stating that he proposed to insist in the conclusion for damages only. The defender objected, on the ground that the conclusion for damages was in its terms conditional on decree of absolvitor in the declarator being pronounced, and that the executor was not in titulo to move for declarator. Held that the conclusions were truly alternative, and that the executor was entitled to be sisted to the effect of pursuing the conclusion for damages. Green or Borthwick v. Borthwick, Dec. 8, 1896, p. 211.

Husband's liability for wife—Proof.

2. Whether refusal of wife to allow child to be vaccinated was refusal of husband in the sense of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, sec. 18. Cockett v. Beattie, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 62.

Capacity of married woman.

3. Held that a married woman is disqualified for acting as the curator of a minor. Chalmers' Trustees v. Sinclair, July 10, 1897, p. 1047.

Divorce—Reclaiming Note—Competency.

4. Held that it was competent for the defender in an action of divorce for adultery, who had appeared by counsel, but had not lodged defences or contested the case on the merits, to reclaim against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary granting decree of divorce. Ross v. Ross, July 3, 1897, p. 1029.

Divorce—Adultery—Relevancy—Latitude as regards time.

5. In an action of divorce by a husband against his wife on the ground of adultery the pursuer averred that the defender had committed adultery with persons named "during" periods which extended over from one year to three years, but specified no precise date or occasion within the several periods. The Court refused to allow a proof of these averments. Soeder v. Soeder, Jan. 5, 1897, p. 278.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Jurisdiction—Domicile—Separation.

6. In an action of separation and aliment brought by a wife residing in Scotland against her husband residing in England, evidence on a consideration of which it was held that the defender had never lost his Scottish domicile, and that the Court had jurisdiction. Hood v. Hood, June 24, 1897, p. 973.

INCOME-TAX. See Revenue, 3 to 6.

INDICTMENT. See Justiciary Cases, 25 to 28.

INHIBITION. Petition for recall—Expenses.

1. A creditor raised an action for payment of a debt and used inhibition on the dependence, but he acceded to a composition arrangement on his debtor's estate, and the summons was not called. He subsequently refused to discharge the inhibition on payment of the composition being tendered. In a petition at the instance of the debtor, held that he was entitled to have the inhibition discharged, and that the creditor was liable for the expenses of the application. Robertson v. Park, Dobson, & Co., Oct. 20, 1896, p. 30.

Sale of heritage—Objection to title—Obligation to clear record.

2. In an action by a purchaser of heritage for implement of an obligation by the seller's agents to produce searches shewing a clear record, the defenders tendered searches which disclosed two inhibitions used against the seller prior to the date of the disposition by him. The defenders alleged that the inhibitions were invalid. Held that whether the inhibitions were or were not valid, the defenders were bound to implement their obligation to clear the record by having them discharged. Dryburgh v. Gordon, Oct. 15, 1896, p. 1.

INSURANCE. Fire Insurance—Agreement to insure—Occurrence of fire before premium paid—Payment to agent—Relevancy.

1. In action brought against an insurance company to recover loss arising from a fire which took place in May, the pursuer averred that in April he "insured with the defenders' agent A certain subjects, that a policy was duly prepared by the defenders, and the premium due thereunder was paid to A as defenders' agent, who has remitted the sum to them less the usual commission allowed for obtaining the insurance and collecting the premium as the agent of the defenders." The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant on the ground that the pursuer did not aver that the policy had been delivered or that the premium had been paid prior to the fire, and that A was authorised to receive payment on behalf of the company. M'Elroy v. London Assurance Corporation, Jan. 6, 1897, p. 287.

Marine Insurance—Valued Policy—Total Constructive Loss.

2. The question whether a ship, insured under a valued policy, is a total constructive loss or only a partial loss, is to be determined by the state of matters existing at the date when action on the policy is raised, and not by the state of matters at the date of notice of abandonment, and that whether the state of matters at the date of the action is due to accident, or the intervention of third parties, or to the exertions of the insurers themselves. Ship "Blairmore" Co., Limited, v. Macredie, June 4, 1897, p. 893.

Accident Insurance—Condition—Wilful, wanton, or negligent exposure to unnecessary danger.

3. A policy of insurance against accidental death or injury excepted from the risks covered by the policy accidents to the insured "whilst . . . wilfully, wantonly, or negligently exposing himself to any unnecessary danger." The insured, who was an expert swimmer, was drowned when bathing alone from a boat in a Highland loch on an evening at the end of April. Held that the act of the deceased in bathing in the circumstances described was not of so manifestly dangerous a character as to exclude a claim under the policy. Sangster's Trustees v. General Accident Insurance Corporation, Limited, Oct. 28, 1896, p. 56.

INSURANCE—Continued.

Accident Insurance—Blood-poisoning—Proof—Confidentiality—Medical practitioner refusing to disclose patient's name.

4. An insurance company granted a policy in favour of a medical practitioner whereby they agreed to compensate him if he should "sustain any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means operating accidentally on the person of the insured, and capable of direct proof." An indorsation bore that the policy "covered compensation for blood-poisoning which is the result of an accidental injury within the meaning of the policy." In an action upon the policy for compensation, the pursuer alleged that, in operating on a patient on 14th August 1894, he accidentally inflicted a slight wound on his left hand, and that he then received syphilitic blood-poisoning. The pursuer proved that, on 14th August, while performing a uterine operation, he scratched a finger on his left hand with the curette he was using, and that about twelve days after symptoms of syphilitic poisoning shewed themselves. Several medical witnesses deponed that they had no doubt that the place of inoculation was the wound on the finger. The pursuer led no evidence to shew that the patient on whom he operated was syphilitic, other than his own testimony and the medical evidence that the place of inoculation was the wound. He deponed that his father had been treating the patient for syphilis, but he did not call him as a witness, and he refused to disclose the name of the patient to the defenders, on the ground that it would be a breach of professional duty for him to do so. Held that the pursuer had failed to prove by the best available evidence that the patient was suffering from syphilis, and so capable of conveying the poison to him, and that the defenders were entitled to absolvitor. A B v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 258.

Accident Insurance—Conditions as to notice of accident—Post-mortem Examination—Waiver.

5. A policy of accident insurance with an insurance company provided that it should be a condition precedent to recovery that notice should be given within fourteen days of the accident, and that in the case of death the representatives should agree to a post-mortem examination if required by the insurers. The insured met with an accident and died about a month afterwards. Notice of the accident was not sent to the company till three days before his death. After the death the company wrote to the widow:—"In accordance with the conditions of our policy, we desire to have a post-mortem examination of the deceased." The company did not inform the widow that they intended to reserve the objection to want of timeous notice. The widow gave her consent to the post-mortem examination, which took place accordingly. In an action on the policy brought by the widow as executrix held that the company, by demanding a post-mortem examination, had waived the defence of want of timeous notice. Donnison v. Employers' Accident and Live Stock Insurance Co., Limited, March 10, 1897, p. 681.

Insurance of Debenture in Mortgage Company—"Failure to pay."

6. An insurance company guaranteed to B payment of £600 lent by him to a mortgage company on debenture, repayable on 1st June 1897, "in the event of failure to pay on the part of the debtors." The policy contained the conditions that B should pay a premium of £2, 5s. on 1st June in each year, and that the policy should be void in the event of a premium remaining unpaid for fourteen days. In 1893 the mortgage company went into liquidation, and a reorganisation scheme was assented to by B in July 1894, the insurance company giving their consent in a letter to B, which bore, "This consent will not prejudice your claim under the insurance of your debentures of the" original mortgage company. By this scheme the assets and liabilities of the original mortgage company were transferred to the new company, and B exchanged the debenture which he held for the new company's debentures, which did not mature until 1904. B did not pay the premium payable on 1st June 1895. In July 1895 the insurance company went into liquidation, and B lodged a claim for the amount of the debenture. Held that there could be no "failure to pay" on the part of the debtors in the sense of the policy until June 1897, when the original debenture became payable, and that the policy had lapsed through B's failure to pay the premium due on 1st June 1895. Liquidators of Employers' Insurance Co. of Great Britain, Limited, v. Benton, June 9, 1897, p. 908.

INSURANCE—Continued.

See Revenue, 1, 2.

INTERDICT. Competency of declarator in process of interdict.

In a petition by a railway company for interdict to prevent a hotelkeeper, by himself or his servants, entering the station to meet customers arriving by train, except as permitted by the company, held that the pursuers were entitled to a declaration that, subject to any order or regulation which might thereafter be made by the Railway Commissioners, the defender, as tenant of his hotel, had no right to enter by himself or his servants, except with leave of the pursuers, and under such conditions as they might prescribe, and that in respect of the declaration it was unnecessary to dispose of the prayer for interdict. Perth General Station Committee v. Ross, July 27, 1897, H. L., p. 44.

See Nuisance—Trade-Mark, 3.

INTEREST. Reparation—Mora—Acceptance of interest as bar to claim.

1. Action of damages on account of delay in payment of money by trustees—Acceptance of interest as a bar to claim. Roissard v. Scott's Trustees, May 21, 1897, p. 861.

Agreement to pay share of profits to trustee as a sinking fund to secure debentures—Interest of sinking fund.

2. A company by an agreement entered into with a trustee for future debenture-holders became bound each year "to accumulate as a sinking fund in the hands of" the trustee a proportion of its free annual profits for securing and paying the debentures, the trustee being authorised to invest the trust funds in his hands from time to time. Held that the interest derived from the funds so invested by the trustee did not fall to be credited to the company as part of its annual profits, but that the trustee was bound to accumulate it with the funds forming the sinking fund. Arizona Copper Co., Limited, v. London Scottish American Trust, Limited, March 5, 1897, p. 658.

See Trust, 5, 6.

JUDGE. See Administration of Justice, 1.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. Powers—Curator Bonis.

1. Power to compromise claims relating to ward's moveable estate. Scott v. Craig's Representatives, Jan. 29, 1897, p. 462.

Curator Bonis to Minor—Investment of Curatorial Funds—Discharge—Pupils Protection Act, 1849, sec. 13.

2. Held that the passing by the Accountant of Court—at his annual audit of a judicial factor's accounts under section 13 of the Pupils Protection Act, 1849—of investments made by a judicial factor does not relieve the factor from responsibility for improper investments. Annan v. Annan's Curator Bonis, May 14, 1897, p. 851.

JUDICIAL FACTOR—Continued.

See Expenses, 11, 12, 13—Trust, 9.

JURISDICTION. Rectification of Register of Trade-Marks—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

1. Held by Lord Kincairney, Ordinary, that he had jurisdiction to entertain a petition for rectification of the Register of Trade-Marks by a person aggrieved. Herbert v. Cowie Brothers & Co., Jan. 16, 1897, p. 361.

Reconvention—Foreign.

2. C., a domiciled Englishwoman, brought a note of suspension to have D., the holder of a bill which bore to be accepted by her, interdicted from noting, protesting, or charging upon it. She stated that she was afraid that D., if not prevented, would protest the bill, and having registered the protest and taken out a certificate of registration in terms of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, would proceed to attach her effects in England. In her condescendence and pleas she set forth various objections to the validity of the bill. D. having brought an action against C. for the amount of the bill, she pleaded "no jurisdiction." Held that the defender had not rendered herself liable to the jurisdiction of the Court reconventionne in respect that she had brought the note of suspension of necessity, to protect herself, and with the object of excluding the jurisdiction of the Court. Davis v. Cadman, Jan. 13, 1897, p. 297.

Domicile.

3. Husband and Wife—Action of Separation and Aliment. Hood v. Hood, June 24, 1897, p. 973.

See Election Law, 4—Railway, 1, 5, 6, 8.

JUS QUÆSITUM TERTIO. See Public Official—Superior and Vassal, 6 to 12.

JUSTICIARY CASES. Judge—Declinature—Waiver—Court of Justiciary.

1. A railway company appealed to the High Court of Justiciary against a judgment of a Sheriff acquitting a person of a contravention of one of the company's statutes. Two of the Judges proponed a declinature on the ground that they were shareholders in the company. Question, whether it was competent for the parties to waive the declinature by joint minute. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Ramsay, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 48.

Civil or Criminal—Poinding—Unlawful intromission with poinded effects —"Summary complaint" to Sheriff—Concurrence of Procurator-fiscal —Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 30.

2. Held that the imprisonment provided by the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 30, is not in modum pœnas, but only the usual means of enforcing an order of Court ad factum præstandum, and that a complaint to the Sheriff under this section is a civil process, and does not require the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal. Wilson v. M'Kellar, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 254.

Civil or Criminal—Dogs Act, 1871, sec. 2.

3. Held (quashing a conviction) that the procedure for obtaining an order under the Dogs Act, 1871, sec. 2, is of a civil, not of a criminal, character, and therefore that it was incompetent to "convict" of the "offence" of being owner of a dog which is dangerous and not kept under proper control. White v. Main, July 16, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 90.

Complaint—Relevancy—Want of specification—Penalty—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881.

4. A complaint brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, set forth a contravention of two Acts of Parliament, and in the prayer craved the Court to adjudge accused "to suffer the penalties provided by the said Acts." The body of the complaint contained no reference to penalties. Held that the complaint was irrelevant for want of specification. Jackson v. Stevenson, Feb. 6, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 38.

JUDICIARY CASES—Continued.

Complaint—Relevancy—Clerical error in citation of section of statute—Penalty—Public-House.

5. A licensed grocer was convicted upon a complaint which set forth that the accused had been "guilty of an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, particularly the Public-House Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 2 thereof, and the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 21 thereof, in so far as" he did on a certain day within his shop, and in breach of his certificate, sell whisky to a drunk man, "whereby the said accused is liable" in certain penalties specified, which were the penalties provided by the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, sec. 21. He brought a suspension, in which he alleged that the figure 1 in the reference to sec. 21 of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, had been added to the complaint after it was served upon him. The Court refused the bill, holding that as the penalties were specifically set forth in the complaint it was unnecessary to refer to the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, and consequently that the error in the citation of that Act, assuming that there was an error, did not invalidate the conviction. Cormack v. Mackenzie, Feb. 6, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 36.

Complaint—Relevancy—Specification—Bye-law—Stage carriage.

6. A bye-law issued by the magistrates of a burgh provided that "every stage carriage . . . shall be driven at a regular and steady rate, not exceeding six miles an hour, upon the journey, except when taking up or letting down passengers." The driver of a stage carriage was convicted on a complaint, which set forth that on a certain date and in a certain street within the burgh, and on a certain journey, he did fail "to drive said stage carriage at a regular steady rate not exceeding six miles an hour." Conviction quashed on the ground that the complaint was irrelevant for want of specification in respect that the bye-law might be contravened in a variety of different ways, and that the complaint did not specify the particular mode of contravention which it was proposed to prove against the accused. Drummond v. Macmillan, Nov. 2, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 1.

Complaint—Relevancy—Statute—Repeal—Statute Law Revision Act, 1892.

7. A complaint libelled a contravention of section 26 of the Excise Licences Act of 1825, "as altered or amended by the 8th and 9th sections of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853." The 8th and 9th sections of the Act of 1853 were repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892. Held that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that it was founded on sections of a statute which had been repealed. Morrison v. Stubbs, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 61.

Complaint—Instance—Private Prosecutor—Statutory title to prosecute.

8. Where a private person has by public statute a title to prosecute summary complaints for statutory offences it is not necessary to set forth in the complaint the statute giving the person his title to prosecute. Emslie v. Paterson, June 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 77.

Citation—Error in service copy of complaint.

9. Suspension on the ground that the date of the alleged offence was erroneously set forth in the service copy of the complaint refused, in respect that the accused had pleaded to the charge, and the leading of the evidence had commenced before the accused took the objection. Dunsmore v. Threshie, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 73.

JUDICIARY CASES—Continued.

Citation—Name of prosecutor—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 10.

10. Summons citing a person to answer to a complaint under the Sale of Foods and Drugs Act, 1875, held to be ineffectual in respect that it did not state the name of the prosecutor, as required by section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879. Burns v. Williamson, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 58.

Service—Time—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 10.

11. Held that the day on which the purchase took place was not to be taken into computation in calculating the statutory period under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 10. Frew v. Morris, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 50.

Procedure—Separation of trials—Oppression—Fraudulent Bankruptcy.

12. Five persons were charged upon an indictment which contained eight charges of concealing property falling under bankruptcy, with intent to defraud the creditors of the bankrupt. The charges related respectively to the bankruptcy of one or other of three persons. All the acts charged were of a similar kind and were committed about the same time, and in the same neighbourhood. Two of the bankrupts were among the accused. One of the accused (not a bankrupt) was charged under one of the charges only. Each of the remaining accused was charged under two or more of the charges, but none of the accused was charged under all the charges. At the first diet the Sheriff granted a motion for separation of the trials in the case of the accused who was charged under one charge only, and refused the motion as regarded the remaining accused, three of whom were convicted. Suspension brought on the ground that the Sheriff had acted oppressively in refusing to separate the trials refused. Sangster v. H. M. Advocate, Nov. 2, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 3.
13. A father and daughter were charged, on a single complaint, with selling beer without a certificate. They moved for a separation of the trials. The magistrates refused the motion. The father, having been convicted, brought a suspension on the ground that the magistrates had acted oppressively in refusing to separate the trials. Suspension refused. Collison v. Mitchell, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 52.

Procedure—Conduct of trial—Recall of witness.

14. After the evidence for the prosecution and for the defence in a Police Court prosecution had been concluded, and before parties had addressed the Court, the magistrates recalled one of the witnesses and put certain questions to him. Suspension on the ground that the magistrates had acted incompetently in thus examining the witness refused. Collison v. Mitchell, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 52.

Procedure—Record of proceedings—Productions—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 16.

15. At the trial on a summary complaint the accused produced a bottle of beer, with a printed label on it, and put questions regarding the contents of the bottle to certain of the witnesses adduced by him. No mention of the bottle with label was made in the record of the proceedings. The accused having been convicted brought a suspension on the ground that "production, namely, a bottle of beer," was omitted from the record. Suspension refused in respect that the bottle was not "documentary evidence" within the meaning of section 16 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864.

At the trial on a summary complaint, charging the keeping of beer for the purpose of illegally trafficking in it, one of the witnesses for the defence deposed that the beer labelled was his property, and took out of his pocket an invoice for beer in his favour from the brewers. He retained possession of the invoice, and no mention of it was made in the record of the proceedings. The accused was convicted. In a suspension on the ground that the invoice had not been noted on the record, held that, as the invoice had not been made a production, it was not necessary to note it on the record. Collison v. Mitchell, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 52.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Procedure—Record—Noting of documents.

16. Observations on the necessity, in summary prosecutions, of noting in the record of the proceedings all documents which are made productions. Burns v. Williamson, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 58.

Procedure—Adjournment.

17. Held that the absence of a written record of the adjournment in a summary prosecution was a fundamental nullity which vitiated the whole proceedings. Craig v. Tarras, July 16, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 88.

18. On 8th October, after part of the evidence for the prosecution on a summary complaint had been led, the presiding Justices adjourned the diet till 12th October in order to consider an objection by the accused to the competency of the proceedings. At the adjourned diet the accused was convicted. He brought a suspension pleading that it was incompetent for the Justices to adjourn the diet. Suspension refused. Dunsmore v. Threshie, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 73.

Procedure—Suspension—Irregularity in procedure—Visit by Magistrate to locus—Remit to Sheriff.

19. A person was charged in the Police Court with having wilfully and maliciously scratched and defaced a door of a dwelling-house in a particular street. After evidence had been led and counsel for the parties heard, the magistrate adjourned the diet. The accused having been subsequently convicted brought a bill of suspension, averring that, between the adjournment and the conviction, the magistrate had made an independent examination of the door in question. The Court having remitted to the Sheriff to inquire into the facts, the Sheriff reported that the magistrate had at the close of the trial made up his mind to convict, but had not determined upon the sentence, and that the alleged examination by him of the door was accidental and casual. Held that there was no sufficient irregularity to justify a suspension of the conviction. Sime v. Linton, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 70.

Proof—Rape—Evidence of woman's unchastity.

20. In a trial for rape or assault with intent to ravish, while it is competent, on due notice being given, to attack the woman's character for chastity by putting questions to herself, or to prove her general bad repute at the time of the alleged offence, or to prove that she had recently yielded her person voluntarily to the accused, it is not in general competent to prove individual acts of unchastity on her part with other men. Dickie v. H. M. Advocate, July 15, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 82.

Conviction—Alternative charge and general conviction.

21. Suspension on the ground that the conviction was a general conviction upon an alternative charge repelled, in respect that the charge was not alternative, but was a charge of committing the same statutory offence in two ways. Gammel v. Weir, Jan. 28, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 23.

Conviction—General Statutory Charge under two subsections of same section.

22. Conviction suspended, in respect that it was a singular conviction upon a complaint charging two separate and distinct offences. Aitchison v. Neilson, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 44.

Conviction—Penalty—Omission of statutory award of penalty—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. c. 108), sec. 26.

23. A person charged, at the instance of the inspector of poor of the parish, with a contravention of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, pleaded guilty and was convicted by the Sheriff. The conviction adjudged the accused to pay a penalty of 20s., but contained no award and order regarding the penalty in terms of section 26 of the statute. In a suspension, held that the conviction fell to be quashed in respect that it contained no award and order in terms of section 26. M'Callum v. Barrowman, Nov. 3, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 15.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Sentence.

24. Oppression. Sime v. Linton, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 70.

Offence—Fraudulent Bankruptcy—“Intent to defraud”—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, sec. 13—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 8.

25. It is unnecessary to set forth intent to defraud in an indictment charging a sequestrated bankrupt with a contravention of the 13th section of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, by concealing his property. Taylor v. H. M. Advocate, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 65.

Offence—Fraudulent Bankruptcy—Indictment—Concealment of property—Relevancy—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, sec. 13.

26. An indictment under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, after setting forth that the accused had been sequestrated, and that within four months next before the presentation of his petition for sequestration he had concealed his property, proceeded,—“and thus he did not, to the best of his knowledge and belief, fully and truly disclose the state of his affairs, in terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and did not deliver up to his said trustee all his property which he was required by law to deliver up, contrary to the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, section 13, subsection (a), 1, 2, and 3 thereof.” It was objected that the statement that the bankrupt had concealed his property was not libelled as a substantive charge, but was introduced merely as explaining the mode in which he committed the offences of failing to disclose and failing to deliver his property to the trustee. Held that this was a good charge of concealment of his property by the bankrupt under subsection 3 of section 13 of the Act. Taylor v. H. M. Advocate, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 65.

Offence—Fraudulent Bankruptcy—Property and all documents in control of the bankrupt—Relevancy—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, sec. 13, subsec. 2.

27. Held that in an indictment under subsections 1, 2, and 3 of section 13 of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, it is unnecessary, in order to the relevancy of a charge under subsection 2, to set forth that the property which the bankrupt is alleged to have failed to deliver to the trustee in his sequestration was “in his custody or under his control.” Taylor v. H. M. Advocate, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 65.

Offence—Fraudulent Bankruptcy—Indictment—Specification—Locus—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, subsecs. 1, 2, and 3.

28. A bankrupt was charged under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, with having concealed “in the stable in Charles Street Lane, Edinburgh, and in the dwelling-house at No. 5 Bristo Street, Edinburgh, then both occupied by Robert Forrest, cattle-dealer,” certain specified property, including a large number of articles. Objection that the locus was indefinite and wanting in specification repelled. Taylor v. H. M. Advocate, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 65.

Offence—Fraudulent Bankruptcy—Art and part—Aiding or abetting a fraudulent bankrupt.

29. Aiding or abetting a bankrupt or insolvent person on the eve of bankruptcy in putting away or concealing his effects with intent to defraud his creditors is a crime at common law. Sangster v. H. M. Advocate, Nov. 2, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 3.

Offence—Dentists Act, 1878, sec. 3—Unregistered Person—“American Dentistry”—“Dental Office.”

30. A. Emslie, a person who was not registered under the Act, placed on his door a brass plate with the inscription "American Dentistry. A. Emslie"; also another plate, with the inscription "Dental Office." Held (quashing a conviction) that in putting the plates on his door Emslie had not committed an offence under the Act, in respect that the inscriptions did not imply that he was registered under the Act, or that he was a person specially qualified to practise dentistry. Emslie v. Paterson, June 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 77.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Offence—Poaching—Game reserved to landlord—Verbal authority of tenant to kill rabbits—Ground Game Act, 1880, sec. 1, subsec. 1—Day Trespass Act, 1832.

31. The tenant under a lease which reserved to the landlord the game including the rabbits, hired A, who was not a servant on the farm, to kill rabbits, but did not grant written authority to A to do so. A having killed rabbits under this employment was convicted of a contravention of the Day Trespass Act, 1832. In an appeal A contended that at common law a tenant had right to employ a person to kill rabbits as vermin, and that a person in taking such employment was not bound to inquire into the terms of the lease. Held that, as the tenant had no right to kill rabbits except under the Ground Game Act, and as A had no written authority, the conviction was valid. Richardson v. Maitland, Feb. 6, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 32.

Offence—Trespass—Railway—Level Crossing—Caledonian Railway Act, 1893, sec. 37.

32. The Caledonian Railway Act, 1893, sec. 37, enacts certain penalties for trespass on the company's railways, lands, and property, subject to the proviso that no person should be subject to any penalty under this enactment unless the company proved, to the satisfaction of the Sheriff or Justices, that a public notice warning persons not to trespass had been affixed, inter alia, "at the level crossing (if any) nearest to the spot where such trespass is alleged to have been committed." Held that the term "level crossing" included private level crossings, and therefore that the company were barred from exacting a penalty for trespass under sec. 37, where the level crossing nearest to the spot where the trespass was alleged to have been committed was a private level crossing, and no notice had been affixed at that crossing. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Ramsay, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 48.

Offence—Fishing—Water-bailiff—Police-constable—Right to search before apprehension—Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857, sec. 37.

33. Opinions per curiam that water-bailiffs are not entitled to search a person whom they suspect to be guilty of illegal fishing unless they have previously apprehended him upon what they believe to be good grounds, or unless they have a warrant to search him. Jackson v. Stevenson, Feb. 6, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 38.

Offence—Fishing—Beam-Trawling—High and low-water marks—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 6.

34. The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, prohibits beam-trawling "within three miles of low-water mark of any part of the coast of Scotland" (except within areas to be defined by the Fishery Board). Held that the prohibited area includes the space between high-water mark and low-water mark. Whyte v. Thomson, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 55.

Review—Case stated—Refusal of inferior Judge to state case—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, secs. 3 and 5.

35. A Sheriff-substitute refused to state a case for appeal against a conviction. Note under section 5 for an order on the Sheriff-substitute to shew cause why a case should not be stated refused on the ground that it did not appear either from the Sheriff's certificate or from the note that any questions of law had been raised before or decided by the Sheriff-substitute, or that he had been asked to state any question of law. Martin v. Beattie, Jan. 27, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 21.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Review—Statutory exclusion of review—No written record of adjournment—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 495.

36. Held that the absence of a written record of an adjournment in a Police Court prosecution was a fundamental nullity which vitiated the whole proceedings, and that the conviction was not protected from review by section 495 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. Craig v. Tarras, July 16, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 88.

Review—Appeal against judgment acquitting accused—Reversal of judgment.

37. In an appeal against a judgment of a Sheriff acquitting the accused on a complaint charging a contravention of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, the Court sustained the appeal and reversed the determination of the Sheriff, but refused to remit the case to him with their opinion. Whyte v. Thomson, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 55.

LAW-AGENT. See Administration of Justice, 2, 3—Agent and Client.

LEASE. Constitution—Agreement to transfer engineer's business with plant in consideration of annuity—Implied right to occupy premises—Rent—Summary removal.

1. In January 1894 A, an engineer, by written agreement assigned and transferred to B "the business of engineer presently carried on" by him in certain premises named which belonged to him, "and the whole stock, funds, assets, rents, and goodwill thereof, together with the whole machinery and appliances in said premises whether fixed or unfixed." B, on the other hand, agreed to pay to A an annuity of £250 during his life, A having a right to resume possession of the business in the event of his annuity remaining unpaid at any time for six months. It was further provided that B should not be entitled to sell the business or any part of the plant during A's lifetime. Part of the plant consisted of heavy fixed machinery which could not be removed except at great expense and loss of time, and the business had been carried on in the same premises for upwards of twenty years. A having brought an action of summary removal against B, held that, as in a question between A and B, the agreement imported a lease of the premises during A's life, the rent though not specifically stated being covered by the annuity, and the defender assolvièd. Thomson v. Thomson, Dec. 18, 1896, p. 269.

Constitution—Tramway.

2. Terms of a contract between a burgh corporation and a tramway company which was held to be truly a lease and not merely a licence to use carriages with flanged wheels on certain streets. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Corporation of City of Glasgow, March 4, 1897, p. 628.

Joint Lease—Title to Sue—Assignment pendente processu.

3. One of two persons who ex facie of a lease were joint tenants of a farm sent a notice of a claim to compensation to the County Council, which had taken a feu of part of the farm, the landlord having power to resume under the lease. In a suspension of proceedings for having the claim determined by arbitration the County Council pleaded, inter alia, that the claimant being only a joint tenant was not in titulo to insist in the claim. The claimant answered that he had the whole real interest in the farm, and lodged pendente processu an assignment in his favour by the other tenant setting forth that fact. Opinions that the claimant had a good title. District Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanark v. Marshall, Nov. 10, 1896, p. 139.

Subject—Power to resume—Feu of lands resumed—Liability of feuor to compensate tenant—County Council—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 39 and 116.

LEASE—Continued.

4. By lease of a farm dated in 1886 the landlord, inter alia, reserved power "to take off such part of the lands hereby let as may be considered expedient for the purpose of feuing . . . it being hereby provided that the annual value of any ground thereby taken from the said lands shall be paid to the tenants" at the rate of £4 an acre. In 1893 the landlord resumed five acres of the farm, and by private agreement feued the land so resumed to the County Council. Thereafter the District Committee of the County Council erected a hospital on this land under the powers of section 39 of the Public Health Act, 1867. In 1896 the tenant, who had since the resumption been receiving from the landlord an abatement of rent equal to £4 an acre for the land resumed, served a notice on the District Committee in which he claimed compensation for unexhausted manure, &c., and, founding on section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1867, took proceedings for having the amount of such compensation settled by arbitration. In a note of suspension and interdict brought by the District Committee, held that the proceedings for arbitration fell to be interdicted in respect that the tenant's only right to compensation, if he had any, was against his landlord. District Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanark v. Marshall, Nov. 10, 1896, p. 139.

Subject—Lease of water in ponds and streams leading thereto.

5. Under the lease of a distillery there was let to the tenant the distillery and a piece of land, with two ponds, "with right to the water in the said ponds, and in the streams leading thereto." A stream from the hills entered the upper pond, from which the water flowed in a stream into the lower pond. A few yards from the lower pond, but not within the land leased, was a spring, from which water percolated through marshy ground into that pond. After the date of the lease the landlord collected the water from the spring already mentioned, and from other springs, into a tank, and by means of a pipe carried part of this water to the house of another of his tenants, the remainder of the water collected in the tank passing through an overflow pipe into the pond. The tenant of the distillery brought an action to have the landlord interdicted from interfering with the water from the spring. Held (diss. the Lord Chancellor, aff. judgment of Second Division) that the tenant was not entitled to interdict, in respect that water percolating from a spring to a pond did not constitute a stream in the sense of the lease. Held further (by the whole House) that assuming that there was an implied obligation on the landlord not to execute any operations which would have the effect of decreasing the amount of water in the ponds, the tenant had failed to prove that the landlord's operations had this effect. Opinion (per Lord Shand) that such an implied obligation was to be inferred from the terms of the lease. M'Nab v. Robertson, Dec. 15, 1896, H. L., p. 34.

Subject—"All as some time occupied by" preceding tenant—Extrinsic Evidence.

6. A farm was let for a term of years "all as some time occupied by" B, the preceding tenant. Some years after the date of the lease a question arose as to whether a piece of rough pasture which had been possessed by the tenant since his entry was included in the subjects let. It was proved that this pasture had not been occupied by B, but the tenant deposed that before offering for the farm he had applied to the landlord's factor to shew him the boundaries, and that the factor had pointed out the pasture as included in the farm. Held that, assuming the accuracy of the tenant's statement, the representation made by the factor had been superseded by the description given in the lease, that B's possession was the measure of the tenant's right, and that the tenant was not entitled to the ground in question. Gregson v. Alsop, July 13, 1897, p. 1081.

LEASE—Continued.

Reparation—Defect in house accepted without complaint by tenant.

7. A tenant took a house entering from a common stair fenced by two walls, but having no hand-rail. He did not complain to the landlord of the want of a rail either when he took the house or subsequently. The tenant having fallen upon the stair and received injuries which resulted in his death, his widow raised an action of damages against the landlord, on the ground that the accident was due to his fault in not having provided a hand-rail. Held that, as the tenant had taken the house without objection, and had never afterwards complained to the landlord, there was no fault on the landlord's part in a question with the pursuer. Russell v. Macknight, Nov. 7, 1896, p. 118.

Reparation—Promise of landlord to repair defect.

8. The wife of a tenant of a house raised an action against the landlord to recover damages. The pursuer averred that her husband was occupying the house as a monthly tenant; that in February 1896 he complained to the defender's factor that the ceiling was in an apparently insecure condition; that the factor admitted that the ceiling required repair, and undertook to put it right; that the complaint and undertaking were repeated in April 1896; that the pursuer's husband, in reliance on the factor's assurances, continued the tenancy; that the factor did nothing; and that in November 1896 a portion of the ceiling fell on the pursuer and severely injured her. Held that the action was relevant. Shields v. Dalziel, May 14, 1897, p. 849.

Reparation—Emerging Defect.

9. The wife of a tenant of a house was injured by falling through a wooden stair in the house, and in an action of damages at her instance against the landlord she averred that her husband had been tenant of the house for thirty years; that the steps of the stair were after the accident discovered to be in a decayed, rotten, and ruinous condition; that the defender was personally aware of the dangerous state of the stair; that the pursuer's husband had frequently asked the defender to have the stair repaired, and that he had specially done so about a month before the accident, when the stair was inspected by the defender's factor. The Court, holding that the averments disclosed a case for inquiry, allowed an issue for the trial of the cause. Hall v. Hubner, May 29, 1897, p. 875.

Reparation—Defective Drainage.

10. In an action of damages by a tenant against his landlord for loss arising from defective drainage, the pursuer averred that the drainage of the house was defective; that the subjects let were old, and that the drains had not been examined for seven years; further, that for many years prior to his occupation the premises had been occupied, and "complaints have been made to the defender by previous tenants regarding the insanitary condition of the premises." Held that the last averment was not sufficiently specific to be admitted to probation, and that quoad ultra there was no relevant averment of fault on the part of the landlord. Baikie v. Wordie's Trustees, July 14, 1897, p. 1098.

Reparation—Obligation of tenant to occupy premises let—Damage to premises from leaving them unoccupied.

11. The landlord of a dwelling-house raised an action of damages against the tenant, and averred that the defender, without the pursuer's knowledge, left the house for seven months entirely unoccupied and uncared for, without fire or cleaning, and exposed to damp, frost, and dirt, greatly to the permanent injury of the house and its chances of finding another tenant; that one of the water-pipes burst and ran for days, to the injury of the floor, paper, and walls; and that the windows were broken because of the filthy, deserted appearance of the house, and because of its being left without protection. Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant. Smith v. Henderson, July 14, 1897, p. 1162.

LEASE—Continued.

Termination—Tenant possessing a farm and steelbow stock under contract of service—Landlord taking possession on death of servant—Act 1696, c. 5—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 110.

12. A landlord, in an agreement with G., his ground officer, agreed to give him possession of a farm from Whitsunday 1887 rent free as part of his salary, and also to hand over to him the horses and farm implements and corn crop of 1887 without payment, it being stipulated that a valuation should be made in the same way as if G. were an incoming tenant, and that a similar valuation should be made when the arrangement terminated, and any difference paid by landlord or tenant as the case might be. The agreement was yearly, and might be terminated at any Whitsunday on four months' notice. On G.'s death (on 14th May 1895) the landlord took possession of the farm, and sold the horses, &c. Within seven months after G.'s death his estates were sequestrated, and thereafter the trustee in the sequestration brought an action calling upon the landlord to account for the value of the horses, implements, and crop. He averred that at the date of his death G. was not bankrupt. Held that the contract was terminated by G.'s death, and that the landlord thereupon became entitled to take possession of the farm and of the horses, implements, and crop, as proprietor thereof, and that his possession was not open to challenge either under the Act 1696, cap. 5, or section 110 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. Torrance v. Traill's Trustees, March 19, 1897, p. 837.

Termination—Irritancy—Option to declare lease ipso facto null and void in event of tenant executing trust-deed—Damages for breach of contract

13. The lease of a farm in favour of A and B jointly and their respective heirs, excluding subtenants and assignees, contained a clause declaring that if the estates of the tenants, or either of them, were sequestrated, or conveyed in trust for behoof of their creditors, the lease should, in the option of the landlord, be ipso facto null and void. Before the end of the lease the estates of A were sequestrated. B continued solvent and offered to go on with the lease. The landlord declined to agree to this, and claimed damages for loss through diminution of rent in consequence of the premature termination of the lease. In a question as to the validity of the landlord's claim, held (1) that assuming A to have abandoned the lease, such abandonment did not terminate B's tenancy; (2) that the lease must be held to have been terminated by the landlord in the exercise of his option, and therefore that the landlord was not entitled to damages for breach of contract. Buttercase & Geddie's Trustee v. Geddie, July 16, 1897, p. 1128.

Termination—Bankruptcy—Trust for creditors—Adoption of lease by trustee.

14. Deeds on a construction of which held that a trustee for tenant's creditors must be held to have possessed the farm as tenant under the lease, and that he was personally liable for the rent of the year during which he had possessed. Moncreiffe v. Ferguson, Oct. 24, 1896, p. 47.

Termination—Condition—Forfeiture—Drunkenness—Public-House—"Doing anything which may endanger" licence.

15. By lease of a restaurant for eleven years, from 28th May 1892, it was provided that in the event of the lessee failing to conduct the business properly, or committing any breach of the licence certificate held by him for the premises, or any offence against the Public-Houses Acts or Excise laws, or permitting betting on the premises, "or doing anything which may endanger the continuance or renewal" of the licence certificate, it should be competent for the lessors to bring this lease to a termination either immediately or at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter. Averments in an action of declarator of forfeiture of the lease on a consideration of which the Court dismissed the action as irrelevant. Noble v. Hart, Nov. 24, 1896, p. 174.

LEASE—Continued.

Termination — Meliorations — Compensation — Bankruptcy — Trust for creditors.

16. By the lease of a farm, the landlord, in the event of the tenant becoming insolvent, had the option to terminate the lease, and in the event of his exercising this option he was bound to settle with the tenant as if the lease had naturally expired. Under the lease the tenant became entitled on its termination to the value of certain meliorations on buildings taken over by him from the previous tenant as the same might be fixed by arbitration, and the general regulations of the estate, which were incorporated in the lease, inter alia, provided,—“The outgoing and incoming tenants must settle between themselves regarding the payment of crop, manure, and other things, without any responsibility on the heritor, unless the heritor chooses to interfere.” The tenant having become insolvent and having granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, the landlord terminated the lease and let the farm to a new tenant. Thereafter the landlord and the trustee entered into a reference to have the value of the meliorations on buildings and of the manure, &c., fixed. Under this reference the value was fixed at £189, 1s. The trustee having brought an action against the landlord for payment of this sum, the landlord pleaded compensation in respect of a sum of £197, 12s. 6d., being the amount of arrears of rent due by the tenant. The trustee maintained that the plea of compensation was ill founded in respect (1) that the landlord having the option under the lease of either leaving the tenant to settle with the incoming tenant for meliorations, manure, &c., or of himself settling with the tenant, the agreement under which he elected the latter course was to be regarded as constituting an obligation incurred to the trustee subsequently to the tenant's insolvency, to which (in accordance with Taylor's Trustees v. Paul, 15 R. 313) the doctrine of compensation was applicable; and in respect (2) that the landlord having (as the trustee averred) acceded to the trust, the trustee was vested in the tenant's right to the manure, &c., free of any obligation to compensate. Held that both claims arose out of the contract of lease, and that the plea of compensation fell to be sustained. Jaffray's Trustee v. Milne, Feb. 26, 1897, p. 602.

See Jusiciary Cases, 31—Prescription—Public Burden.

LEGITIM. See Succession, 1.

LIBEL (SLANDER). See Reparation, 5 to 10.

LICENCE. See Lease, 15—Public House.

LIEN. See Ship, 1.

LIFERENT AND FEE. See Marriage-Contract, 1, 2, 3—Succession, 10 to 13.

LOCAL AUTHORITY. See Burgh—Police—Public Health.

MALICE. See Reparation, 5, 6, 7.

MANDATORY. See Process, 9.

MARRIAGE. See Husband and Wife.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. Constitution—Trust-deed by a woman before marriage for behoof of spouses in liferent and children in fee—Revocation—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881.

1. Deed executed on the day before her marriage by a woman sui juris which was held in an action brought by her, with the consent of her husband, a year after the marriage, there being no children, to be revocable by her with his consent, in respect that it was unilateral and executed without reference to any contract of marriage, and that there were no beneficiaries in existence other than the spouses. Watt v. Watson, Jan. 16, 1897, p. 330.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT—Continued.

Construction—Whether grandchildren could claim as "issue" of the marriage—Renunciation of life-ent—Alimentary Provision.

2. Terms of a marriage-contract, on a construction of which it was held (1) that the words "issue of the marriage," as used in the deed, applied exclusively to the children, and did not include grandchildren; (2) that the husband was entitled to renounce a life-ent which he enjoyed under the marriage-contract; and (3) that the trustees were bound on production of a discharge by the children, and a renunciation of his life-ent by the husband, to divide the trust-estate among the children. M'Murdo's Trustees v. M'Murdo, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 458; cf. Turner's Trustees v. Turner, March 4, 1897, p. 619.

Estate conveyed.

3. Terms of a marriage-contract, on a construction of which held that a life-ent falling to the wife under her father's settlement did not fall within the conveyance of her whole means and estate in her marriage-contract. Neilson's Trustees v. Henderson, July 17, 1897, p. 1135.

Vesting—Vesting of provision to children—Clause of survivorship—Power of appointment—Acceleration of vesting by deed of appointment.

4. Terms of antenuptial marriage-contract, on a construction of which held, on the predecease of the husband, that the persons entitled to the fee of the estate conveyed by the wife, in the event of a power of appointment not being exercised, were the children alive at the death of the longest liver of the spouses, and the issue of such as might have predeceased that date; that these persons were the sole objects of the power of appointment; and therefore that the trustee under the marriage-contract was bound to hold the estate conveyed by the wife until her death. Cuming's Trustee v. Cuming, Nov. 14, 1896, p. 153.

Discharge—Power to revoke.

5. Deed of discharge by the daughters of a marriage, under which they gratuitously renounced a share of the marriage-contract funds in absolute fee, and in lieu accepted a life-ent of the share, with a fee to their issue, whom failing, to their brothers, held to be irrevocable. Neish's Trustees v. Neish, Jan. 13, 1897, p. 306.

MASTER AND SERVANT. See Lease, 12—Reparation, 18 to 26.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONER. See Insurance, 4.

MINES AND MINERALS. See Reparation, 21, 23, 24—Superior and Vassal, 2 to 5.

MINOR AND PUPIL. Curator—Married Woman.

1. Held that a married woman is disqualified for acting as the curator of a minor. Chalmers' Trustees v. Sinclair, July 10, 1897, p. 1047.

Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Sale of heritage by factor loco tutoris—Minor's power to test on proceeds of sale.

2. A minor pube may dispose by will of moveable property belonging to him as a surrogatum for heritage. Brown's Trustee v. Brown, June 18, 1897, p. 962.

Authority to pay income of legacy for behoof of minor legatee domiciled in England.

3. Petition by trustees acting under a Scottish trust-settlement for authority to pay the income of legacies to the fathers of minor beneficiaries who were domiciled in England, and from whom, according to the law of England, a valid discharge could not be obtained, refused on the ground that the Court had no power to grant the authority craved. Atherstone's Trustees, Oct. 24, 1896, p. 39.

MINOR AND PUPIL—Continued.

Homologation—Adoption—Transaction by curators without concurrence of minor.

4. The right of a proprietor of estates adjoining the sea to work coal below low-water mark was challenged by the Crown during his minority. The estates to which the minor had succeeded consisted in part of entailed and in part of unentailed lands. The administration of the unentailed estate was vested in the testamentary trustees of the minor's father, who were also the curators of the minor. These trustees, without the concurrence of the minor, entered into a transaction with the Crown, whereby they on their part accepted a lease of the whole coal below low-water mark ex adverso of both the entailed and unentailed estates, and the Crown agreed not to claim damages in respect of the coal which had been worked in the past. After he came of age the proprietor accepted an assignation of the lease, and subsequently applied for and obtained from the Crown a reduction of the royalty payable under, and a modification of the mode of working enjoined by the lease. When he so acted in regard to the lease, the proprietor was unaware that he had well-founded claims to the coal below low-water mark, and that the lease was the result of a compromise, involving a surrender of his claims, between his father's trustees and the Crown. In an action of declarator brought by the proprietor against the Crown upwards of fourteen years after he had reached majority, held (1) that the trustees having had no right to transact in regard to the entailed estates, their whole agreement with the Crown was null; and (2) that the actings of the proprietor after he came of age, while he was ignorant of his rights, did not infer homologation or adoption of the transaction, and that he was not barred from challenging it. Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 216.

Discharge of debtors of pupils—Factor loco tutoris.

5. Pupil children, whose parents were dead, having become entitled to a sum in settlement of an action of damages, moved the Court to appoint a person to receive the money and discharge the debtors. The Court, on the objection of the debtors, declined to make the appointment craved, on the ground that the debtors were entitled to an effectual discharge, and that a factor loco tutoris was the proper person to grant such a discharge. Connolly v. Bent Colliery Co., Limited, July 20, 1897, p. 1172.

MORA. See Expenses, 5—Fraud, 1—Public Burden, 3—Prescription—Railway, 9—Reparation, 12.

NEGLIGENCE. See Reparation, 14 to 26.

NEWSPAPER. See Reparation, 8, 11.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. See Bankruptcy, 11, 15—Burgh, 1—Process, 16—Trust, 2, 12, 13.

NUISANCE. Tramways—Snow and Salt—Interdict—Actio popularis.

A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the street by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines. In a suspension and interdict brought by a member of the public to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, the tramway company pleaded that the operations complained of were within their statutory rights. It was proved that the operations of the tramway company created a nuisance to the complainant and to the public using the streets for horse traffic. Held (in rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the statutory powers given to the tramway company to use the streets did not authorise them to create a nuisance, and that the complainer was entitled to an interdict against the company removing snow from the tramway lines in certain streets, and from scattering salt in the manner hitherto practised by them to the nuisance of the complainer and of the public using the streets for the purpose of traffic with horses. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co., Dec. 14, 1896, H. L. p. 8.

NUISANCE—Continued.

ONUS. See Company, 1.

PARENT AND CHILD. See Expenses, 10—Minor and Pupil, 3.

PARTNERSHIP. See Stamp, 3.

PLEDGE. See Right in Security.

POACHING. See Justiciary Cases, 31, 33.

POINDING. Unlawful intromission with poinded effects—"Summary complaint" to Sheriff—Concurrence of Procurator-fiscal—Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 30.

Held that the imprisonment provided by the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 30, is not in modum pœnæ, but only the usual means of enforcing an order of Court ad factum præstandum, and that a complaint to the Sheriff under this section is a civil process, and does not require the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal. Wilson v. M'Kellar, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 254.

POLICE. Election of Police Commissioners—Casus improvisus—Order by Court—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 17.

1. A burgh administered by twelve police commissioners elected by the whole burgh was divided into four wards in 1895, and in 1896 an election fell to take place in each of the four wards for the purpose of filling the places of the four senior commissioners, who were bound to retire from office in that year. Prior to the date of the election a fifth commissioner intimated his resignation, and, as he had been elected by the burgh and not by a ward, the election of his successor did not fall to any particular ward. The commissioners applied to the Court for an order under sec. 17 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. The Court ordered the election of an additional commissioner by the First Ward. M'Callum v. Lochhead, Oct. 17, 1896, p. 26.

Public Official—Resolution regarding salary of official—Jus quæsitum.

2. At a meeting the Commissioners of a burgh resolved to increase by £10 the salary of their sanitary inspector, but no official intimation of the resolution was made to him. At a subsequent meeting they cancelled their former resolution. In an action against them by the sanitary inspector, held that the pursuer had no jus quæsitum under the resolution, as it had not been intimated to him. Burr v. Commissioners of Bo'ness, Nov. 13, 1896, p. 148.

Street—Nuisance—Tramways—Snow and Salt—Interdict—Actio popularis.

3. A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the street by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines. In a suspension and interdict brought by a member of the public to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, the tramway company pleaded that the operations complained of were within their statutory rights. It was proved that the operations of the tramway company created a nuisance to the complainer and to the public using the streets for horse traffic. Held (in rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the statutory powers given to the tramway company to use the streets did not authorise them to create a nuisance, and that the complainer was entitled to an interdict against the company removing snow from the tramway lines in certain streets, and from scattering salt, in the manner hitherto practised by them to the nuisance of the complainer and of the public using the streets for the purpose of traffic with horses. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co., Dec. 14, 1896, H. L., p. 8.

POLICE—Continued.

Street—Maintenance of foot-pavement—Order by Police Commissioners—Process—Appeal—Competency—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 143, 339.

4. Held that the right of appeal to the Sheriff given by section 143 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, was limited to cases where the appellant's property was affected, and therefore that it was competent for an owner of property within a burgh, who had been called upon by the Police Commissioners to repair a foot-pavement which bounded but was not upon, and did not affect, his property, to appeal to the Court of Session under section 339, in respect that, his property not being affected, he had no right of appeal under section 143. Laurenson v. Police Commissioners of Lerwick, Nov. 10, 1896, p. 135.

Street—Footway—Statute—Construction—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 6, 141, and 327—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 149.

5. Held that section 141 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, applied to cases where a footpath had already been constructed under the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862. Police Commissioners of Govan v. Airth, Oct. 24, 1896, p. 41.

Special Water Supply and Drainage District—Farm Buildings within Special District—Principle of Valuation—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, sec. 45, subsec. 1.

6. Of a farm of 223 acres, 9 acres, including the farm-house and steadings, lay within a special water supply and drainage district. The Assessor, in valuing the 9 acres, included the value of the buildings thereon. Held that the farm, with the farm buildings, should have been valued as an unum quid, and the amount distributed proportionally to acreage. Forbes Irvine v. Assessor of Aberdeenshire, March 17, 1897, p. 741.

Special Water Supply District—Assessment—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 89, 94, and 97—Public Health Amendment Act, 1871, sec. 1.

7. A Local Authority is not entitled to promote a scheme for the introduction of a water supply into a special water supply district the estimated cost of which will exceed the amount which they can recover under their assessing powers within the special district. Local Government Board for Scotland v. County Council of Elgin, Feb. 5, 1897, p. 512.

Water Supply—Natural Water-course—"Sewer"—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 215.

8. A burn which passed through a burgh was to some extent polluted by sewage from properties outside the burgh, but no sewage from the burgh entered it. Held that the burn was not a "sewer" in the sense of section 215 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892. Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v. Macindoe, Nov. 20, 1896, p. 160.

Special Lighting District—Oil as an illuminant—Burgh Police Act, 1892, sec. 99.

9. Held that the use of oil as an illuminant is not excluded by the terms of section 99 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. Fleming v. Liddesdale District Committee, Jan. 6, 1897, p. 281.

Assessments—Resolution to apply assessments to expenses of opposing bills in Parliament—Appeal—Competency—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 339.

10. Police Commissioners passed a resolution to charge the expenditure incurred by them in opposing a private bill in Parliament to the Public Health Assessment. A ratepayer appealed under sec. 339 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, on the ground that the resolution was ultra vires. Appeal dismissed as incompetent. Heddlie v. Magistrates of Leith, March 5, 1897, p. 662.

POLICE—Continued.

See Burgh—Justiciary Cases, 6—Police Force—Road.

POLICE FORCE. Consolidation of County and Burgh Police—Representation of burgh on Standing Joint Committee—Police (Scotland) Act, 1857, secs. 2 and 61—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, secs. 11, 18, and 97.

1. In 1893 an agreement was entered into between a county council and the police commissioners of a burgh for the consolidation of the county and burgh police, it being provided that the police commissioners of the burgh should have right to appoint three of their number to be members of the standing joint committee. Held that the burgh representatives were entitled to sit as members of the standing joint committee when acting as the police committee, but that they were not entitled to do so when the joint committee was transacting other county business, and therefore that the burgh representatives were not entitled to vote in the election of the permanent chairman of the standing joint committee. County Council of County of Elgin v. Magistrates of Elgin, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 537.

Police-constable—Right to search before apprehension.

2. Opinions per curiam that water-bailiffs are not entitled to search a person whom they suspect to be guilty of illegal fishing unless they have previously apprehended him upon what they believe to be good grounds, or unless they have a warrant to search him. Jackson v. Stevenson, Feb. 6, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 38.

Police-constable—Apprehension without a warrant.

3. A married woman living in Edinburgh brought an action against a detective in the Edinburgh police for damages on account of his having wrongfully compelled her to accompany him to the police-office. The pursuer averred that her son, a boy of twelve, having found some clinical thermometers in the street, brought them to her; and that while she and her husband were taking means to discover whether the thermometers were of any value the defender came to her house, and after charging her with having come by the thermometers dishonestly, forcibly, and without a warrant, compelled her to accompany him to the police-office, where, after a short examination, she was discharged; and that the defender had acted wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant. Malcolm v. Duncan, March 17, 1897, p. 747.

Police-constable—Slander—Privilege.

4. In an action of damages for alleged slander, brought by a woman against a detective-officer, the pursuer averred that the defenders came to her house and insisted on her accompanying him to the police-office, and repeatedly, and in a loud voice, in the presence and hearing of another detective and of her two sons, called her a "resetter" of certain articles which one of her sons had found in the street. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant. Malcolm v. Duncan, March 17, 1897, p. 747.

Police-constable—Assault—Regulation of traffic.

5. The driver of a hackney carriage having been convicted of assaulting a police-constable of a burgh while in the execution of his duty, appealed on a case stated. The Court—being of opinion that it was the duty of every police-constable in a burgh to regulate the street traffic of the burgh—dismissed the appeal, and found that upon the facts stated there was no legal ground upon which the magistrate was bound to hold that the constable was not acting in the execution of his duty at the time when the assault was committed. Fowler v. Hodge, Nov. 3, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 17.

POLICE FORCE—Continued.

POOR. Settlement—Minor Pubes—Second marriage of pauper's mother.

1. A derivative residential settlement acquired by a woman on her second marriage does not enure to a child of her first marriage. Parish Council of Shotts v. Parish Councils of Bothwell and Rutherglen, Nov. 24, 1896, p. 169.

Settlement—Forisfiliation—Pauper mentally weak.

2. Evidence on a consideration of which it was held that a girl, mentally and physically weak, had not been forisfiliated, and that the parish of her father's settlement was liable for sums disbursed on her behalf. Parish Council of Brechin v. Parish Council of Barony Parish, Glasgow, Feb. 24, 1897, p. 587.

Settlement—"Common Begging"—Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 76.

3. Evidence on a consideration of which it was held that a pauper had not acquired a residential settlement in the parish of B., in respect that, during the statutory period, she had had recourse to common begging. Parish Council of Blantyre v. Parish Council of Rutherglen, March 11, 1897, p. 695.

See Election Law, 1.

POOR'S-ROLL. Circumstances warranting admission.

1. Held that a workman earning 31s. 6d. a week, with a wife and two children dependent on him, who had been found to have a probabilis causa litigandi, was not entitled to the benefit of the poor's-roll. Macaskill v. M'Leod, June 30, 1897, p. 999.

Reporters equally divided in opinion.

2. An action of damages for personal injury was dismissed by a Sheriff-substitute as irrelevant, and the pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and applied for admission to the poor's-roll. The reporters on probabilis casu were equally divided as to the relevancy of the pursuer's averments. The Court refused the application. Ormond v. Henderson & Sons, Jan. 23, 1897, p. 399.

POSSESSION. See Fishings.POST-MORTEM EXAMINATION. See Insurance, 5.POWERS. See Succession, 8, 11, 15, 18.PRESCRIPTION. Quinquennial Prescription—Removal from the lands—Tenant becoming proprietor—Mora—Act 1669, c. 9.

The tenant of a farm having become its proprietor did not leave the farm but continued to occupy it as proprietor. More than five years thereafter he was sued for rent effairing to the period of his occupancy as tenant. He pleaded the Act 1669, c. 9. Held that the Act did not apply, in respect that the defender had not removed from the lands. Johnston's Executrices v. Johnston, March 3, 1897, p. 611.

See Superior and Vassal, 2 to 5.

PROCESS. Ordinary Procedure—Summons—Action by separate pursuers for lump sum of damages—Amendment—Competency.

1. A's testamentary trustees, and B, a member of a dissolved firm, who had acted as A's law-agents, brought an action against C, who had been employed by A as an accountant, concluding for delivery of documents belonging to the trust-estate and for payment "to the pursuers" of £100 as damages. The pursuers alleged that C had been employed by A to audit the accounts of his business, and had also been employed to wind up the affairs of B's firm; that in these capacities he had obtained possession of documents having reference to the business carried on sometime by A and afterwards by his trustees, and that in breach of his duty he had communicated information so obtained to third parties, to the damage of the pursuers. The defender objected that the action was incompetent, being at the instance of separate pursuers for payment of a lump sum of damages. Held that it was competent to amend the summons by concluding for payment to the pursuers, A's trustees, instead of to the pursuers generally. Brown's Trustees v. Hay, July 15, 1897, p. 1108.

PROCESS—Continued.

Ordinary Procedure—Summons—Action on bill of exchange—Court of Session Act, 1850, section 1, schedule A—A. S. 31st October 1850.

2. Held that where an action is founded on a bill of exchange, the bill must be set forth in the conclusions of the summons. Davis v. Cadman, Jan. 13, 1897, p. 297.

Ordinary Procedure—Summons—Conclusions—Declarator of marriage—Breach of promise and seduction.

3. A woman brought an action against a man concluding for declarator of an irregular marriage, "but if it shall be found that the pursuer is not married to the defender, then and in that case" for £3000 as damages for breach of promise and seduction. The pursuer pleaded that decree of declarator ought to be pronounced, "or alternatively" that decree ought to be pronounced "in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons." While the action was in dependence the pursuer died, and her executor craved leave to be sisted as pursuer, stating that he proposed to insist in the conclusion for damages only. The defender objected, on the ground that the conclusion for damages was in its terms conditional on decree of absolvitor in the declarator being pronounced, and that the executor was not in titulo to move for declarator. Held that the conclusions were truly alternative, and that the executor was entitled to be sisted to the effect of pursuing the conclusion for damages. Green or Borthwick v. Borthwick, Dec. 8, 1896, p. 211.

Ordinary Procedure—Record—Admission qualified by counter claim—Irrelevancy of counter claim.

4. Where a defender judicially admitted the pursuer's claim to a sum of money subject to an alleged counter claim, but failed to state any relevant ground for the alleged counter claim, held that the pursuer was entitled to found on the admission as unqualified. Robertson & Co. v. Bird & Co., July 10, 1897, p. 1076.

Ordinary Procedure—Record—Amendment—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

5. Circumstances in which the Court allowed the appellant in a Sheriff Court action to amend his defences, on condition that he should find caution for the sum of £30, to meet the expense of the prior proceedings in the case in the event of it turning out that he was in fault in not originally proponing the defence embodied in the proposed amendment. Paton v. McKnight, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 554.
6. In an action of damages by a seller for breach of a contract of sale by the buyer failing to take delivery in terms thereof, the pursuer in his record as originally framed stated the damage he had suffered to be "the difference between the contract price and the current price" of the goods sold at the date of the alleged breach. After the Lord Ordinary had taken the case to avizandum on a proof, the pursuer proposed to amend his condescendence by substituting for the averment above quoted the following:—"The loss of profit occasioned to the pursuers through the said breach of contract amounts to the sum sued for." Held that the amendment was competent. Govan Rope and Sail Co., Limited, v. Weir & Co., Jan. 19, 1897, p. 368.

PROCESS—Continued.

7. A brought an action in the Sheriff Court against B and C and the D company, averring that he had invested £450 in the purchase of certain shares in a ship; that B and C had held the ship in part in trust for him, and that in breach of this trust they had sold the whole ship to the D Company. He prayed for decree against the defenders, jointly and severally, for payment of £450, with interest from the date on which the investment had been made. In the record as closed the pursuer did not state his claim to be for damages, but after certain procedure in the action he craved leave to amend his record by adding certain averments, and a plea that he was entitled to the sum sued for as damages. The defenders objected that the proposed amendment was incompetent as not being within the scope of the action as originally laid. The Court allowed the amendment. Rottenburg v. Duncan, Oct. 23, 1896, p. 35.

Ordinary Procedure—Defences—All parties not called.

8. The railway carriages on the East Coast Route from Edinburgh to London were the joint property of three companies, A, B, and C. In an action by A against B concluding, inter alia, for declarator that B was not entitled to use the joint property without the consent of A, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the conclusion fell to be dismissed in respect that the third joint owner C had not been made a party to the action. North British Railway Co. v. North-Eastern Railway Co., Dec. 17, 1896, H. L., p. 19.

Ordinary Procedure—Mandatory—Foreigner resident in England—Impecuniosity—Judgments Extension Act, 1868.

9. Held that an American pursuer, who was resident in England and had no immediate intention of leaving that country, was not bound to sist a mandatory, in respect that the decree of the Scots Court for expenses could be enforced against him in England under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.

Mere impecuniosity is not a sufficient ground for ordaining a party to sist a mandatory. Dessau v. Daish, June 26, 1897, p. 976.

Ordinary Procedure—Caution for expenses—Personal liability of cautioner in suspension—Trust.

10. The complainer in a suspension of a charge upon a bill having died, his widow, one of his trustees, was at her own request sisted as complainer in his place as his "trustee," and found caution, her cautioner becoming bound "that she shall, as trustee foressaid, pay" the sum in the bill "in full in the event of there being a sufficiency of trust funds, or rateably along with the other creditors" of the truster "in the event of his estate proving insufficient to pay his creditors in full," and also "that payment shall be made of whatever sum the said Lords shall modify in name of damages and expenses in case of wrongous suspending." The Court ultimately repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the complainer liable in expenses "as trustee." In an action by the charger against the cautioner, held that whatever the liability of the complainer might be, the cautioner was liable to the charger in payment of the whole expenses. Stewart v. Forbes, July 15, 1897, p. 1112.

Ordinary Procedure—Reponing—Appeal—Expenses.

11. No appearance being made for the pursuer of an action in a Sheriff Court at a diet of debate, the Sheriff-substitute assoilized the defender. The pursuer appealed. Held that, as a condition of being allowed to proceed with the action, the pursuer must pay the whole expenses of the defender in both Courts. McCarthy v. Emery, Feb. 27, 1897, p. 610.

Ordinary Procedure—Reponing—Decree in default—Failure to lodge defences and accounts—Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 6—Sheriff Court Act, 1876, sec. 20.

12. In an action raised in the Sheriff Court by trustees against the law-

PROCESS—Continued.

agent to the trust, concluding for an accounting, and failing this, for payment of £500, the defender lodged no defences, but put in a minute craving the Court to sist proceedings in order to give him time to lodge his accounts, which he alleged would shew a debit balance against the trust. The Sheriff-substitute granted a sist for ten days, and at the end of that period, the defender having failed to lodge defences or produce his accounts, the Sheriff-substitute decerned for the sum sued for. On appeal the Sheriff, in respect of no appearance being made for the defender, dismissed the appeal. The defender having appealed to the Court of Session, and moved to be reponed, the Court, in respect that the sum sued for, and for which the Sheriff-substitute had granted decree, was a random sum, recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and remitted to the Sheriff to consider the defender's application to be reponed, and in the event of sufficient cause being shewn, and of his lodging accounts within eight days, to allow defences to be lodged within two days. Brown's Trustees v. Milne, July 17, 1897, p. 1139.

Ordinary Procedure—Reclaiming Note—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868, secs. 27, 28, and 54.

13. Held that it was competent for the defender in an action of divorce for adultery, who had appeared by counsel, but had not lodged defences or contested the case on the merits, to reclaim against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary granting decree of divorce. Ross v. Ross, July 3, 1897, p. 1029.
14. Held that an interlocutor (not falling within the provisions of sec. 28 of the Court of Session Act, 1868) which does not, either by itself or taken along with a previous interlocutor or interlocutors, dispose of the question of liability for expenses, is not an interlocutor disposing of the whole subject-matter of the cause, and cannot be reclaimed against without the leave of the Lord Ordinary.

The Court will not entertain an incompetent reclaiming note although the respondent waives his right to object. Burns v. Waddell & Son, Jan. 14, 1897, p. 325.

15. In an action of accounting at the instance of a beneficiary against trustees, the pursuer objected to the amount of the business account of the law-agent of the trustees. The Lord Ordinary remitted the account to the Auditor of the Court of Session to tax, and did not grant leave to reclaim. The defenders having reclaimed, the Court refused the reclaiming note as incompetent. Turner v. Fraser's Trustees, March 6, 1897, p. 673.

Ordinary Procedure—Decree—Recall—Res noviter—Nobile Officium—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28.

16. After an interlocutor allowing proof in an action has become final in terms of section 28 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, the Court cannot, in the exercise of its nobile officium, order its recall on the application of one of the parties to the cause. MacGown v. Cramb, Feb. 2, 1897, p. 481.

Ordinary Procedure—Decree—Poiniding—"Summary complaint" to Sheriff—Concurrence of Procurator-fiscal—Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 30.

17. Held that the imprisonment provided by the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 30, is not in modum pœnae, but only the usual means of enforcing an order of Court ad factum præstandum, and that a complaint to the Sheriff under this section is a civil process, and does not require the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal. Wilson v. M'Kellar, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 254.

Ordinary Procedure—Decree—Decree ad factum præstandum—Appeal to House of Lords—Interlocutor ordaining defender to commence building

Process—Continued.operations within specified period—Effect of judgment in appeal affirming interlocutor.

18. By interlocutor dated 18th July 1895, the First Division ordained the defenders in an action to commence certain building operations "within three months from the date of this interlocutor." The defenders appealed to the House of Lords, but subsequently, with their consent, the interlocutors appealed against were affirmed and the appeal dismissed. Held that the period within which the defenders were bound to commence building was three months from the date of the judgment of the House of Lords. Marshall v. Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co., Limited, Oct. 22, 1896, p. 33.

Ordinary Procedure—Decree—Interlocutor pronounced in error—Cancellation.

19. An interlocutor dismissing an action in respect of an undertaking by the defenders was pronounced in ignorance of circumstances which made its fulfilment impossible. The Court, on the application of the parties, cancelled the interlocutor. Rottenburg v. Duncan, Oct. 23, 1896, p. 35.

Ordinary Procedure—Expenses—Tender—Delay in accepting.

20. In an action of damages for personal injury, the pursuer was found liable in part of the expenses incurred between the date on which a tender was made and the date of acceptance in respect of undue delay in accepting the tender. M'Laughlin v. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, June 30, 1897, p. 992.

Ordinary Procedure—Expenses—Tender—Conditional Tender.

21. Question, whether the tender of a sum by the defender in an action of damages, accompanied by a declaration that the pursuers' case was unfounded and untrue, was a tender entitling the defender to expenses in the event of the tender being declined, and the sum awarded as damages being less than the sum mentioned in the tender. Thomson & Co. v. Dailly, July 20, 1897, p. 1173.

Ordinary Procedure—Expenses—Time for objecting to Lord Ordinary's award.

22. When a party reclaiming objects to an interlocutor not only as wrong on the merits but also as wrong in finding the reclamer liable in expenses, even if right on the merits, he must state his objection as to expenses in opening on the reclaiming note. Clark v. Sutherland, March 18, 1897, p. 821.

Proof—Diligence to recover writings—Slander—Newspaper—Anonymous letter—Diligence for recovery of original letter.

23. In an action of damages for slander against the proprietors of a newspaper founded on statements contained in an anonymous letter published in the newspaper, the pursuer, a parish clergyman, averred that the letter "was written or procured to be written by the defenders for publication in their newspaper in pursuance of a malicious design to injure the pursuer," and "to destroy his reputation" as a clergyman. The defenders refused to disclose the name of the writer of the letter, and the pursuer moved for a diligence for the recovery of the original letter. The Court refused the diligence. Morrison v. Smith & Co., Jan. 30, 1897, p. 471.

Proof—Diligence to recover writings—Order for proof.

24. In an action of damages the ground of action averred by the pursuer was that the defender had refused to implement an award appointing him to retire certain bills of lading. The defender, besides disputing the validity of the award, denied liability on the ground that the goods covered by the bills were not conform to contract. The Lord Ordinary allowed the pursuer "a proof of his averments on record, and to the defenders a conjunct probation." Held that the defender was not entitled to a diligence for the recovery of documents bearing upon the condition of the goods—evidence on that question being excluded by the terms of the order for proof. Scott, Simpson, & Wallis v. Forrest & Turnbull, June 1, 1897, p. 877.

PROCESS—Continued.

Proof—Diligence to recover writings—General averments of fraud.

25. In an action for reduction of a compromise between liquidators and a contributory, the pursuers averred that a contributory had fraudulently concealed from the liquidators certain specific items of property belonging to him, and also "other assets belonging to him and money in his possession to the extent of at least £40,000." The Court allowed a proof before answer, and thereafter granted a diligence entitling the pursuers to recover, not merely documents relative to the specific investments alleged to have been fraudulently concealed by the contributory, but also documents for the purpose of prosecuting a general inquiry into the completeness of the disclosures made by him to the liquidators. Assets Co., Limited, v. Shirres' Trustees, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 418.

Proof—Diligence to recover writings—Irrelevancy of averments.

26. When a Lord Ordinary had allowed a party a proof of his averments, held that the Lord Ordinary was not entitled to refuse a diligence for the recovery of documents on the ground that the averments remitted to probation were irrelevant. Duke of Hamilton's Trustees v. Woodside Coal Co., Jan. 9, 1897, p. 294.

Proof—Jury Trial—Abandonment—A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, sec. 46.

27. Procedure where no jury cited, or where citation of jury countermanded, and no appearance made for pursuer. Gilhooly v. McHardy, July 20, 1897, p. 1185; and Mooney v. William Dixon, Limited, July 20, 1897, p. 1187.

Proof—Jury Trial—Abandonment—Appeal for Jury Trial—Judicature Act, 1825, secs. 10 and 40.

28. Where an action raised in a Sheriff Court has been removed to the Court of Session by appeal under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, it is competent for the pursuer to abandon the action in the form appropriate to abandonment under sec. 10 of that Act and Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, sec. 115, as if the case had originated in the Court of Session. Aitken v. Farquhar, Dec. 18, 1896, p. 268.

Proof—Jury Trial—Appeal for jury trial—Remit to Lord Ordinary—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 40.

29. In an action of accounting raised in a Sheriff Court the defender, having appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, moved for a proof in the Court of Session. The pursuer submitted that the case should be sent back to the Sheriff Court for proof. Held that the proper course was to take the proof in the Court of Session, there being no circumstances rendering the case specially suited for trial in the Sheriff Court. Tosh v. Ferguson, Oct. 27, 1896, p. 54.

Proof—Jury Trial—Notice of Motion for a new trial—Time—A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, sec. 36—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 4.

30. In determining whether a notice of motion for a new trial has been timeously given, the February week instituted by the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 4, is to be regarded as in the same position as the Christmas recess under the A. S., 16th February 1841. Cockburn v. Hogg, Feb. 18, 1897, p. 529.

Proof—Jury Trial—Motion for postponement of trial.

31. Circumstances in which the Court refused a motion for the postponement of a jury trial. British Workman's and General Assurance Co. v. Stewart, March 4, 1897, p. 624.

Proof—Remit to man of skill—Failure to execute contract—Averments of Fraud.

32. A contractor executed certain excavation and drainage work. Two years after the work had been completed and duly certified by the engineers, the owners presented a petition in the Sheriff Court against the contractor, in which they averred that the work done was disconform to contract in many important particulars, which they set forth, and that the defender "by means of fraudulent devices succeeded in palming off the work as being executed according to contract." The prayer of the petition was that the Sheriff should remit to a man of skill to inspect and value the work and report upon its present state, and also what was necessary to bring it into conformity with the specification; that the pursuers should be authorised to do whatever required to be done in accordance with such report, and to apply the balance of the contract price still in their hands to the completion of the work, in so far as it might be shewn by the reporter to be defective. The contractor lodged defences in which he denied the pursuers' averments. Held that the action was incompetent. Magistrates of Kilmarnock v. Reid, Jan. 22, 1897, p. 388.

PROCESS—Continued.

Proof—Remit to reporter—Work to be "duly proceeded with" at sight of reporter—Province of reporter.

33. In an action by a superior against a vassal the defender was ordained "forthwith to proceed to rebuild the buildings" of a hydropathic establishment which had been destroyed by fire, "and that to the extent necessary to maintain said buildings as of the total value of £15,000, said rebuilding to be commenced within three months" from 8th May 1896, "to be duly proceeded with to the satisfaction of A, architect, and to be completed to his satisfaction within two years" from 8th May 1896. The defender having commenced to build within three months, and the reporter having reported that the buildings in course of erection were not of a satisfactory character, held that the defender must be left to act upon his own responsibility, and that the function of the reporter was merely to see that the work was being proceeded with, and when that work was completed to report whether it was what was ordered. Marshall v. Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co., Limited, March 12, 1897, p. 712.

Particular Actions—Count, reckoning, and payment—Competency—Claim against trustees for interest in respect of failure to invest.

34. In an action of accounting brought against testamentary trustees jointly by certain beneficiaries, the trustees produced accounts which shewed that the trust funds had been allowed to remain in bank for a number of years on deposit-receipt. The pursuers contended that the trust-estate fell to be credited with the additional interest which would have been realised if the funds had been invested on heritable security. The defenders maintained that this was a claim for damages for breach of trust, which could not be entertained in an action of accounting. Held that it was competent to entertain the question of the liability of the defenders for a higher rate of interest in the action of accounting. Melville v. Noble's Trustees, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 243.

Particular Actions—Declarator—Competency of declarator in process of interdict—Railway.

35. In a petition by a railway company for interdict to prevent a hotelkeeper, by himself or his servants, entering the station to meet customers arriving by train, except as permitted by the company, held that the pursuers were entitled to a declaration that, subject to any order or regulation which might thereafter be made by the Railway Commissioners, the defender, as tenant of his hotel, had no right to do so, except with leave of the pursuers, and under such conditions as they might prescribe, and that in respect of the declaration it was unnecessary to dispose of the prayer for interdict. Perth General Station Committee v. Ross, July 27, 1897, H. L., p. 44.

PROCESS—Continued.

Particular Actions—Declarator—Sheriff—Competency—Declarator of illegal preference—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 10—Bankruptcy and Real Securities (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 9—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1877, sec. 8 (2).

36. Held that an action praying the Court to find a certain payment by an insolvent debtor within sixty days of bankruptcy to be null and void at common law and under the Act 1696, c. 5, and to find that the payment was an illegal preference, and to set aside the same, was competent in the Sheriff Court. M'Laren's Trustee v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, June 12, 1897, p. 920.

Particular Action—Declarator—Building Restrictions.

37. In an action for declarator that certain building ground within a burgh was not subject to any building restrictions, the Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the ground was subject to certain restrictions and not to others, but he pronounced an interlocutor assailing the defenders, holding that it was incompetent to pronounce a limited decree unless the pursuers restricted their summons, which they declined to do. Held (rev. the judgment) that it was competent to pronounce a limited decree, and that decree fell to be pronounced accordingly. Assets Co., Limited, v. Ogilvie, Jan. 23, 1897, p. 400.

Particular Actions—Special Case—Questions not argued.

38. The Court will not answer questions in a special case which are not argued. Mackinnon's Trustees v. MacNeill, June 29, 1897, p. 981.

Particular Actions—Special Case—Competency.

39. A special case was presented by a County Council, as first parties, and a District Committee of the County Council, as second parties, to determine the question whether an assessment should be levied from the whole county or only from the district. The Court, ex proprio motu, dismissed the case as incompetent, in respect that the District Committee, not being concerned with the payment of rates, had no interest or title to appear. County Council of County of Roxburgh v. Melrose District Committee, March 5, 1897, p. 657.

Particular Actions—Suspension—Extrinsic objection to judgment of inferior Court—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868.

40. It is not competent to set aside by way of suspension the decree of an inferior Court on the ground that it has been obtained by fraud. Smith v. Kirkwood, May 28, 1897, p. 872.

Particular Actions—Suspension—Bill-Chamber—Sheriff—Interim decree ad factum praestandum—Sist of execution.

41. In a Sheriff Court action the Sheriff granted warrant to the pursuer to restore a wall which had been interfered with by the defender, to its original condition, but refused to deal with the question of expenses until the wall had been restored. The interlocutor not being appealable the defender presented a note of suspension praying the Court to interdict the pursuer from interfering with the wall or enforcing the decree. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills granted interim interdict and passed the note. The pursuer reclaimed, and contended that the suspension was incompetent, and that any sist of execution would prevent an appealable interlocutor being obtained from the Sheriff, and would therefore be permanent. Both parties moved the Court to decide the case on the merits. The Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, holding that the suspension was competent, but that it was not competent for the Court sitting in the Bill-Chamber to do more than to pass the note. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Cochran's Trustees, May 21, 1897, p. 855.

Particular Actions—Proving the Tenor—Requisite Adminicles.

42. Circumstances in which the Court refused to grant decree of proving the tenor of a deed, in respect that no evidence of the particular terms of the essential clauses of the deed was adduced. Incorporation of Skinnern and Furriers in Edinburgh v. Baxter's Heir, March 17, 1897, p. 744.

PROCESS—Continued.

Appeal—Competency—Omission to lodge prints—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 71—A. S., 10th March 1870, sec. 3.

43. In an appeal in vacation from the Sheriff Court the appellant omitted to lodge prints as required by the Act of Sederunt, March 10, 1870, sec. 3. An objection was taken to the competency of the appeal, and the appellant having admitted that the failure to print was not due to inadvertence, the Court dismissed the appeal as incompetent. Bell v. Bell, May 13, 1897, p. 847.

Appeal—Competency when no answers lodged—Extra cursum curiæ—Arbitration—Petition for recall of arrestments—Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 21.

44. In a petition for recall of arrestments the respondent lodged no answers, and the Sheriff "having heard parties" recalled the arrestments on caution. The respondent having appealed, the petitioner objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that the respondent, in failing to lodge answers, had so deviated from the course of procedure prescribed by the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 21, as virtually to constitute the Sheriff an arbiter. The Court held that there had been no deviation from the statutory procedure, and repelled the objection. Gordon v. Bruce & Co., May 12, 1897, p. 844.

Appeal—Competency—Police—Maintenance of foot-pavement—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 143, 339.

45. Held that the right of appeal to the Sheriff given by section 143 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, was limited to cases where the appellant's property was affected, and therefore that it was competent for an owner of property within a burgh, who had been called upon by the Police Commissioners to repair a foot-pavement which bounded but was not upon, and did not affect, his property, to appeal to the Court of Session under section 339, in respect that, his property not being affected, he had no right of appeal under section 143. Laurenson v. Police Commissioners of Lerwick, Nov. 10, 1896, p. 135.

Appeal—Competency—Police—Assessments—Resolution to apply assessments to expenses of opposing bills in Parliament—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 339.

46. Police Commissioners passed a resolution to charge the expenditure incurred by them in opposing a private bill in Parliament to the Public Health Assessment. A ratepayer appealed under sec. 339 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, on the ground that the resolution was ultra vires. Appeal dismissed as incompetent. Heddle v. Magistrates of Leith, March 5, 1897, p. 662.

See Revenue, 8.

PROCURATOR-FISCAL. See Poiniding.PROOF. Rape—Evidence of woman's unchastity.

1. In a trial for rape or assault with intent to ravish, while it is competent, on due notice being given, to attack the woman's character for chastity by putting questions to herself, or to prove her general bad repute at the time of the alleged offence, or to prove that she had recently yielded her person voluntarily to the accused, it is not in general competent to prove individual acts of unchastity on her part with other men. Dickie v. H. M. Advocate, July 15, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 82.

Writ—Writ of Agent.

2. Held that the accession by a creditor to a composition agreement may be proved by the writ of his duly authorised agent. Henry v. Strachan & Spence, July 10, 1897, p. 1045.

PROOF—Continued.

Extrinsic Evidence.

3. Lease of farm "all as some time occupied by" preceding tenant. Gregson v. Alsop, July 13, 1897, p. 1081.

Husband and Wife.

4. Whether refusal of wife to allow her child to be vaccinated equivalent to the refusal of her husband. Cockett v. Beattie, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 62.

Private knowledge of Judge.

5. Inspection of locus by the Court. Sime v. Linton, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 70.

See Company, 1—Insurance, 4—Process, 23 to 33.

PROPERTY. See Fishings—Road—Servitude—Superior and Vassal.

PROVING OF THE TENOR. See Process, 42.

PUBLIC BURDEN. Relief—Lease—Tramway—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 6.

1. By a contract bearing to be a "lease" the Corporation of Glasgow "let" to a tramway company the sole right to use carriages with flange wheels on the whole tramways authorised to be formed by the Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870, for the space of twenty-three years, on condition (1) that the company should pay interest on the sum expended by the Corporation in making the tramways and certain other annual payments during the lease; and (2) that the company should pay to the Corporation "the expense of borrowing, management, &c. [sic], and this provision shall be so construed as to keep the Corporation free from all expenses whatever in connection with the said tramways." As the lease extended beyond twenty-one years, the company were entered in the Valuation-roll as owners of the tramways at their annual value, and assessed accordingly. In defence to an action by the Tramway Company against the Corporation for relief of such part of the assessment as corresponded to the rent paid by the company, in terms of section 6 of the Valuation Act, 1854, the defenders maintained (1) that the contract was not truly a lease, but merely a licence to use carriages with flanged wheels on certain streets; and (2) that assuming the contract to be a lease, the pursuers were, by the contract, bound to keep the defenders free of this expense. Held (1) that the contract was a lease of a heritable subject, and (2) that the obligation to free the Corporation of all expenses in connection with the tramways did not apply to assessments for which the Corporation was liable as owners of the tramways. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Corporation of City of Glasgow, March 4, 1897, p. 628.
2. Held that the right of relief conferred by section 6 of the Valuation of Lands Act, 1854, could be made effectual otherwise than by deduction from the rent, and that a tenant who had paid rent without deduction had a good claim against the proprietor for repayment of his proportion of rates and taxes. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Corporation of City of Glasgow, March 4, 1897, p. 628.

Relief—Lease—Acquiescence—Mora—Abandonment.

3. Tenants under a lease for a period of twenty-three years intimated to their landlord a claim to be relieved of the owner's proportion of rates and taxes. The landlord repudiated the claim. Held that the tenants were entitled to insist in the claim, there being no special circumstances from which abandonment was to be inferred. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Corporation of City of Glasgow, March 4, 1897, p. 628.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Vaccination—Refusal to allow child to be vaccinated—Proof—Husband and Wife—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, sec. 18.

1. A father was convicted of a contravention of the Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, sec. 18, by having refused to allow his child to be vaccinated. He appealed. The case stated that the Parish Council having issued an order to their vaccinator to vaccinate the child, notice of the order was sent to the accused, with an intimation that the Act directed the vaccination to take place within a period specified; that on a day within the period the vaccinator called at the house of the accused; and that he was then told by the wife of the accused "that she was expecting him, but that her husband, who was not at home, had instructed her on no account to allow the child to be vaccinated." The Court sustained the appeal, holding that it had not been proved that the accused had refused to allow his child to be vaccinated. Cockett v. Beattie, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 62.

PUBLIC HEALTH—Continued.

Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, secs. 13 and 14—Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 3—Analysis—Division of sample—Milk—Statute—Incorporation.

2. Held that section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act of 1875 did not apply to cases in which an official had procured a sample of milk under section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act of 1879. Morton v. Fyfe, Nov. 2, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 9.

See Justiciary Cases, 10, 11, 23—Lease, 4—Police.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Certificate—Transfer—Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 19.

1. A transfer of a certificate running from May 1896 to May 1897 was granted in August 1896 on condition that it "be in force only . . . until the next general meeting to be held for granting such certificates, and be duly presented for entry at the collector's office of excise, Glasgow, within six days from this date, otherwise the same to be null and void to all intents and purposes." This latter condition was not complied with, but the transferee carried on the business of publican. Thereafter the magistrates at the general meeting in October 1896 refused to renew the transfer certificate. The original holder then resumed possession of the premises, and was afterwards convicted of trafficking in excisable liquors without a certificate. In an appeal the original holder contended that the transfer certificate being merely temporary and conditional, and the condition not having been purified, the original certificate remained in force. Held that he had been rightly convicted, the transfer having absolutely divested him of all right of trafficking under the original certificate. Campbell v. Neilson, Feb. 6, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 28.

Certificate—Confirmation—"New Certificate"—Publicans Certificate (Scotland) Act, 1876, secs. 4 and 6.

2. Held that a hotel certificate granted to a person who held a public-house certificate in respect of the same premises was a "new certificate" in the sense of the Publicans Certificate (Scotland) Act, 1876, and required confirmation in order to its validity. Weir v. Bryce, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 42.

See Justiciary Cases, 5, 7, 21—Lease, 15.

PUBLIC OFFICIAL. Local Authority and official—Resolution regarding salary of official—Jus quesitum.

At a meeting the Commissioners of a burgh resolved to increase by £10 the salary of their sanitary inspector, but no official intimation of the resolution was made to him. At a subsequent meeting they cancelled their former resolution. In an action against them by the sanitary inspector, held that the pursuer had no jus quesitum under the resolution, as it had not been intimated to him. Burr v. Commissioners of Bo'ness, Nov. 13, 1896, p. 148.

RAILWAY. Compulsory Powers—Process—Arbitration—Res Judicata—Plea of competent and omitted.

1. By Act of Parliament passed in 1891 the Lanarkshire and Dumbarton-

RAILWAY—Continued.

shire Railway Company were empowered to construct a line of railway from Glasgow to Dumbarton. Section 6, subsection 4, enacted that: the railway should "be carried under the joint sidings and works of the North British Company and the Caledonian Company at Stobcross in tunnel, and the company shall not, without the previous consent of the companies owning the same, in the construction of such tunnel, break open the surface of the ground, or in any way raise or interfere with the rails of the North British Company or of the joint property of that company and the Caledonian Company." The tunnel having been completed, the North British Company brought an action against the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company to have them ordained to remove a ventilating shaft which they had constructed within the North British and Caledonian Companies' depot at Stobcross, averring that they had not obtained the consent of the North British Company to its erection. The Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company having denied this averment, the cause was remitted for decision to an arbiter as required by the special Act of the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company. The decision of the arbiter was to the effect "that the construction of the shaft fell under the provisions of section 6, subsection 4, of the special Act, and required the consent of the North British and Caledonian Companies, and that the consent of the North British Company had not been obtained." The Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company having thereafter served a notice to treat on the North British Company, intimating that they intended to take the ground upon which the shaft was constructed under their compulsory powers, the North British Company applied for interdict against them in any way following up the notice. In defence to this action the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company stated that the limitation on their power to acquire ground compulsorily imposed by section 6, subsection 4, of their Act applied solely to the joint sidings and works of the North British and Caledonian Companies, and that the ground proposed to be taken, though within the depot, was not part of their joint sidings and works. Held that this defence, not being open to the respondents prior to the service of the notice to treat, could not have been dealt with by or pleaded before the arbiter, and therefore that it was open to the respondents still to maintain it. North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., Feb. 23, 1897, p. 564.

Compulsory Powers—Lease.

2. Lease with power to landlord to resume lands—Exercise of power and disposition of lands resumed to County Council—Liability of County Council to compensate tenant. District Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanark v. Marshall, Nov. 10, 1896, p. 139.

Compulsory Powers—Superfluous Lands—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 120.

3. A railway company which, under section 120 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, was bound to sell its superfluous lands before 16th July 1892, had at that date two small plots close to its terminal station, and used them partly as a private means of access to the station buildings, but principally as ornamental garden ground, improving the amenity of the station and its public accesses. In 1896 the owner of lands adjoining, from whom the plots in question had been acquired by the railway company under their compulsory powers, brought an action for declarator that these plots were superfluous lands within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and that they therefore had vested in him on 16th July 1892. The Court assuizied the defenders, holding (1) that certain actings of the directors in regard to proposed sales of the plots did not bar the company from pleading that the lands were not superfluous; (2) that these actings were evidence, but not conclusive evidence, that the plots were superfluous; (3) that the question whether the plots were superfluous was to be determined by the circumstances as existing at 16th July 1892; and (4) that on the evidence as a whole the plots were not superfluous. Macfie v. Callander and Oban Railway Co., July 17, 1897, p. 1156.

RAILWAY—Continued.

Right of Railway Company to exclude from stations persons other than travellers—Interdict.

4. Railway companies are entitled, as proprietors of their stations, to exclude from them all persons except passengers and persons entitled to enter them in virtue of any order or regulation of the Railway Commissioners.

In a petition by a railway company for interdict to prevent a hotel-keeper, by himself or his servants, entering the station to meet customers arriving by train, except as permitted by the company, held that the pursuers were entitled to a declaration that, subject to any order or regulation which might thereafter be made by the Railway Commissioners, the defender, as tenant of his hotel, had no right to do so, except with leave of the pursuers, and under such conditions as they might prescribe, and that in respect of the declaration it was unnecessary to dispose of the prayer for interdict. Perth General Station Committee v. Ross, July 27, 1897, H. L., p. 44.

Facilities—Jurisdiction—Railway Commissioners.

5. The Railway Commissioners have an exclusive jurisdiction to determine what rights of access members of the public who are not travellers may have to a railway station. Perth General Station Committee v. Ross, July 27, 1897, H. L., p. 44.

Running Powers—Right of owning company to exclude running power company—Railway Commissioners.

6. By an agreement incorporated in an Act of Parliament in 1862, it was provided that "for the purpose of maintaining and working in full efficiency in every respect the East Coast Route . . . the North British Company shall at all times hereafter permit the [North Eastern] Company to run over and use the North British Company's railway . . . between Berwick and Edinburgh and Leith, all inclusive . . . subject to the payment" of such rates as should be settled by agreement, or failing agreement by arbitration. Held that the extent to which, and the terms on which the running powers should be exercised, fell to be determined by agreement, or failing agreement by the Railway Commissioners. North British Railway Co. v. North-Eastern Railway Co., Dec. 17, 1896, H. L., p. 19.

Joint railway rolling stock—Process—All parties not called—Action by one of several joint owners against another.

7. The railway carriages on the East Coast Route from Edinburgh to London were the joint property of three companies, A, B, and C. In an action by A against B concluding, inter alia, for declarator that B was not entitled to use the joint property without the consent of A, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the conclusion fell to be dismissed in respect that the third joint owner C had not been made a party to the action. North British Railway Co. v. North-Eastern Railway Co., Dec. 17, 1896, H. L., p. 19.

Rates—Undue Preference—Jurisdiction—Railway Commissioners—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, secs. 2, 3, and 6—Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, sec. 6—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, sec. 8.

8. In an action by a railway company against a trader for rates due for the carriage of goods, the defender maintained that he was entitled to have the rates reduced in respect of illegal preferences granted by the pur- suers to other traders, contrary to the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854. Held that the Court had no jurisdiction, exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the matter of undue preferences under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, having been conferred upon the Railway Commissioners by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, section 6, and the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, section 8. North British Railway Co. v. North British Grain Storage and Transit Co., March 11, 1897, p. 687.

RAILWAY—Continued.

Authorised Rates—Deduction in respect of carriage of goods in trader's own waggons—Railway Rates and Charges, No. 25 (North British Railway, &c.) Order Confirmation Act, 1892, Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges, section 2—Deduction unascertained by arbitration—Compensation.

9. The Railway Rates and Charges, No. 25 (North British Railway, &c.) Order Confirmation Act, 1892, provided by the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges, section 2, that where goods are carried for a trader in his own waggons, the rates authorised to be charged by the railway company shall be reduced by a sum to be determined (in the event of difference between the parties) by an arbiter appointed by the Board of Trade. In an action brought in 1895 by a railway company against a trader for rates for the carriage of goods between January 1893 and February 1894, the defender contended that he was entitled to a greater deduction from the rates than the railway company had allowed in respect of goods carried in his own waggons, and that the railway company was not entitled to decree for payment of rates until the legal amount thereof had been ascertained after an arbitration in terms of the statute fixing the deductions to be allowed. The Court granted decree for the rates sued for on the ground that the defender had unduly delayed to get the amount of the deductions settled by arbitration. North British Railway Co. v. North British Grain Storage and Transit Co., March 11, 1897, p. 687.

Level Crossing—Trespass—Caledonian Railway Act, 1893, section 37.

10. The Caledonian Railway Act, 1893, section 37, enacts certain penalties for trespass on the company's railways, lands, and property, subject to the proviso that no person should be subject to any penalty under this enactment unless the company proved, to the satisfaction of the Sheriff or Justices, that a public notice warning persons not to trespass had been affixed, inter alia, "at the level crossing (if any) nearest to the spot where such trespass is alleged to have been committed." Held that the term "level crossing" included private level crossings, and therefore that the company were barred from exacting a penalty for trespass under section 37, where the level crossing nearest to the spot where the trespass was alleged to have been committed was a private level crossing, and no notice had been affixed at that crossing. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Ramsay, March 12, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 48.

Reparation—Negligence.

11. Liability of railway company for injury caused by defect in one of their waggons while used by another company—Relevancy. Warwick v. Caledonian Railway Co., Jan. 28, 1897, p. 429.

Title to Sue—Public right of way.

12. Held by Lord Low, Ordinary, that a railway company has no title to sue a declarator of right of way in the public interest. Park Yard Co., Limited, v. North British Railway Co., Limited, July 17, 1897, p. 1148.

REAL OR VALUED RENT. See Church, 2.

RECONVENTION. See Jurisdiction, 2.

RELIEF. See Agent and Principal, 3—Public Burden—Reparation, 1.

REMIT. See Process, 32, 33.

REPARATION. Relief—Relief against claim neither admitted nor established.

1. An action concluding for relief against an action for damages which had been brought against the pursuer dismissed as irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer neither averred that he was liable for the damages, nor averred that he had been found liable. Duncan's Trustees v. Steven, June 1, 1897, p. 880.

Infringement of trade name—Measure of damages—Necessity for proving specific damage.

2. A firm of wholesale whisky merchants brought an action against a public-house keeper for interdict against the defender selling whisky as of the pursuers' manufacture or blending which was not of their manufacture or blending, and for £500 as damages on account of such sales. The defender admitted that the pursuers were entitled to interdict, but he maintained that he was liable in nominal damages only, in respect that the pursuers had not proved special damage. The Court held it to be proved that he had fraudulently sold whisky which was not the pursuers' under the pursuers' name in order to discourage the sale of their whisky. There was no evidence that, after the defender's tenancy of his public-house commenced, the total sale of the pursuers' whisky had diminished in the town in which the public-house was situated. Held that the fair inference was that the defender's fraudulent conduct had produced the result which it was intended to produce of substantially injuring the pursuers' trade, and that in the circumstances the damages fell to be assessed at £100. Thomson & Co. v. Dailly, July 20, 1897, p. 1173.

Fraud—Agreement to give credit to third party induced by fraud.

3. Right of a person who has been induced to enter into a contract by the fraud of a third person to be relieved of the contract by the third party, or to damages only. Thin & Sinclair v. Arrol & Sons, Dec. 3, 1896, p. 198.

Apprehension without a warrant—Police-Constable.

4. A married woman living in Edinburgh brought an action against a detective in the Edinburgh police for damages on account of his having wrongfully compelled her to accompany him to the police-office. The pursuer averred that her son, a boy of twelve, having found some clinical thermometers in the street, brought them to her; and that while she and her husband were taking means to discover whether the thermometers were of any value the defender came to her house, and after charging her with having come by the thermometers dishonestly, forcibly, and without a warrant, compelled her to accompany him to the police-office, where, after a short examination, she was discharged; and that the defender had acted wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant. Malcolm v. Duncan, March 17, 1897, p. 747.

Slander—Police-Constable—Privilege.

5. In an action of damages for alleged slander, brought by a woman against a detective-officer, the pursuer averred that the defender came to her house and insisted on her accompanying him to the police-office, and repeatedly, and in a loud voice, in the presence and hearing of another detective and of her two sons, called her a "resetter" of certain articles which one of her sons had found in the street. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant. Malcolm v. Duncan, March 17, 1897, p. 747.

Slander—"Misappropriation of money"—Innuendo—Privilege—Relevancy.

6. In an action of damages for slander, brought by an auctioneer against a solicitor, the pursuer averred that, on 16th May 1896, the defender had employed him to sell some furniture belonging to a trust-estate; that the pursuer sold the furniture, and rendered to the defender a statement of the prices realised for which he was liable to account to the defender; that on 15th August the defender wrote to the pursuer a letter in which the defender, after acknowledging receipt of a letter from the pursuer, intimated that he (the defender) was to "convene the trustees early next week, and shall put before them your misappropriation of their money." The pursuer further averred that after he had paid the money realised by the furniture to the defender, the defender had falsely, maliciously, and calumniously stated to the agent of a bank that the pursuer had misappropriated trust money, meaning thereby that the pursuer had dishonestly appropriated to his own uses moneys belonging to the trustees. The defender averred in answer that the agent of the bank was his father and partner in business, and pleaded privilege. At the hearing counsel for the pursuer stated that he understood that this averment was accurate. Held (1) that as the letter of 15th August bore to be part of a correspondence it was competent, even on a question of relevancy, to look at the whole correspondence of which it formed a part; that so regarding the letter it was not in itself slanderous, and did not support the innuendo that the pursuer had been guilty of dishonest misappropriation of money; and therefore that an issue founded on the letter fell to be disallowed; but (2) that the pursuer's averments of verbal slander uttered to the bank agent were to be taken as they stood on record; that they relevantly set forth a case of verbal slander, but did not disclose a case of privilege, and therefore that an ordinary issue of damages for slander fell to be allowed, the question of privilege being left to be determined by the Judge at the trial. Smyth v. Mackinnon, July 13, 1897, p. 1086.

REPARATION—Continued.

Slander—Privilege—Poaching.

7. A, the tenant of the shootings on a certain estate, complained to an innkeeper in the neighbourhood that poaching had been taking place on the estate, and the innkeeper promised to assist A in finding out who the poachers were. Thereafter the innkeeper was told by a gamekeeper that B had been poaching on the estate. The innkeeper communicated this information to A. In an action of damages for slander brought by B against the innkeeper, held that in making this communication to A the defender was privileged. Nelson v. Irving, July 10, 1897, p. 1054.

Slander—Newspaper—Anonymous Letter—Diligence for recovery of original letter.

8. In an action of damages for slander against the proprietors of a newspaper founded on statements contained in an anonymous letter published in the newspaper, the pursuer, a parish clergyman, averred that the letter "was written or procured to be written by the defenders for publication in their newspaper in pursuance of a malicious design to injure the pursuer," and "to destroy his reputation" as a clergyman. The defenders refused to disclose the name of the writer of the letter, and the pursuer moved for a diligence for the recovery of the original letter. The Court refused the diligence. Morrison v. Smith & Co., Jan. 30, 1897, p. 471.

Slander—Veritas—Counter Issue.

9. Counter issues disallowed on the ground that they did not meet the pursuers' issue. British Workman's and General Assurance Co. v. Stewart, March 4, 1897, p. 624.
10. The pursuer in an action of damages for slander obtained an issue whether at a certain time and place "the defender falsely and calumniously said to . . . that the pursuer was a man of immoral character, and kept a mistress. . . ." The defender on record pleaded veritas, and averred that "the pursuer is a man of immoral character, and during the last two years has associated and has committed adultery with" A, but he only averred two occasions prior to the date of the alleged slander on which adultery had been committed. Held that the defender's averments did not entitle him to the counter issue "whether, during the period of two years prior to the raising of the action, the pursuer has repeatedly committed adultery with" A. Burnet v. Gow, Nov. 19, 1896, p. 156.

REPARATION—Continued.

Taking decree in absence—Damages—Consequential Damages—Publication in "Black List."

11. In an action of damages against a defender for taking decree in absence in the Debts Recovery Court against the pursuer, in breach of an agreement not to do so, held that in assessing the damages the jury were entitled to take into account damage resulting from the publication of the decree in a "Black List," that being proved to be the natural and invariable consequence of a decree in absence being taken in the Debts Recovery Court. Gibson & Co. v. Anderson & Co., Feb. 23, 1897, p. 556.

Damages for delay in payment of money—Interest.

12. A widow raised an action against testamentary trustees for payment of £11,000 as damages on the ground that heritable properties belonging to her had been brought to a forced sale through the fault of the defenders in withholding payment of sums due to her. Held (1) that the action was not relevant, as the pursuer had not set forth circumstances inferring liability on the part of the defenders for damages for delay other than interest; and (2) that the pursuer's acceptance of interest excluded the claim for damages. Roissard v. Scott's Trustees, May 21, 1897, p. 861.

Ship—Harbour—Ship injured by storm while lying in berth assigned by harbour-master.

13. In an action of damages by the owner of a steamship against Harbour Trustees, on the ground that the harbour-master had wrongfully directed the removal of the vessel to a berth which was known to be unsafe, held that the damage was due to the extraordinary violence of the storm, and not to any fault on the part of the harbour-master in fixing the berth, and that the defenders were not liable. Niven v. Ayr Harbour Trustees, June 4, 1897, p. 883.

Negligence—Defective floor in granary—Duty of inspection—Latent Defect.

14. A plumber employed by a farmer sustained injuries while crossing the floor of a granary, which at a particular spot gave way beneath him. In an action of damages by him against the farmer it was proved that the floor had been overhauled two years before the accident by a competent tradesman, and that it had been ever since in daily use by the defender and his servants, who were in the habit of crossing it with heavy weights, and that there was no reason to suppose it was in a dangerous condition. Held that the pursuer had failed to prove that the accident was due to the fault of the defender. Paterson v. Kidd's Trustees, Nov. 5, 1896, p. 99.

Negligence—Unfenced hatchway in shop—Contributory Negligence.

15. A customer on entering a shop found the shopkeeper engaged with another customer, and a shopboy standing near the door. He playfully took the latter by the ear and led him to a narrow passage leading to the back of the shop. On turning to leave it the customer fell into a hatchway and was injured. In an action of damages brought by the customer against the shopkeeper, held (1) that the defender was in fault in not having the hatchway sufficiently fenced, and (2) that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer. Somerville v. Hardie, Oct. 29, 1896, p. 58.

Negligence—Precautions for safety of public—Leaving horse unattended in street.

16. A brought an action of damages against B, averring that the servant in charge of a horse and van belonging to the defender had left the same unattended in a street in Glasgow, although the horse was known to the defender to be a spirited animal, and that the horse had bolted and dashed into the window of the pursuer's shop. Held that the action was relevant. M'Intosh v. Waddell, Oct. 31, 1896, p. 80.

REPARATION—Continued.

Negligence—Precautions for safety of the public—Safety of children—Wall separating public place from railway.

17. In an action against a railway company for damages on account of the death of a son, the pursuer averred that the defenders' line of railway, in passing through a town, was separated from a public court by a wall belonging to the defenders about five feet high on the side facing the court, with a drop about twenty-five feet in depth on the railway side; that this wall was flat on the top, and about fourteen inches wide; that the pursuer's son, who was a boy ten years of age, was playing in the court, and, following the example of his companions, got on to the top of the wall by means of a heap of rubbish, two feet high, which had been left by the defenders against the wall in the court; that the boy, while walking along the top of the wall, stumbled and fell down on to the railway and was killed; and that the accident was due to the negligence of the defenders in not having a fence or other obstruction to prevent children from getting on to the top of the wall, and also in placing the heap of rubbish against the wall. Held that the action was irrelevant. Thomson v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., July 3, 1897, p. 1025.

Negligence—Liability of railway company for injury caused by defect in one of their waggons while used by another company.

18. In an action by a widow against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company and the Caledonian Railway Company to make them liable jointly and severally, or otherwise severally, in damages for the death of her husband, a carter in the employment of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, the Caledonian Railway Company pleaded that in respect the waggons (which had caused the accident, and which belonged to them) were not in their possession nor under their control when the accident happened, but were under the control of the other defenders, the action, in so far as directed against them, was irrelevant. Held that the case could not be decided without an inquiry into the circumstances, and issue adjusted against both defenders. Warwick v. Caledonian Railway Co., Jan. 28, 1897, p. 429.

Negligence—Master and Servant—Railway—Injury to servant from defective plant of third party.

19. The children of a labourer, in the employment of the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company, who was killed while working as a platelayer on a railway siding situated within the steel company's premises, brought an action of damages against the steel company and the Caledonian Railway Company. They averred that the accident had been caused by a defect in the points, which had thrown several waggons off the line during a shunting operation; that the lines, and the engine and waggons which were using them at the time of the accident, belonged to the railway company; that the lines had been kept up by the steel company for at least ten years, and that both the defenders were responsible for their upkeep; that it was the duty of the steel company to have seen that the points could shut, and that the rails, &c., were in good condition, before putting the deceased to work at or near them. Held (1) that there was a relevant case against the railway company, but (2) that no relevant case was stated against the steel company, there being nothing in the pursuers' averments to shew that any duty to see to the maintenance of the line attached to these defenders. Smyth v. Caledonian Railway Co., Feb. 3, 1897, p. 488.

Negligence—Master and Servant—Volenti non fit injuria.

20. A bottler, when in the employment of a firm of aerated water manufacturers, received an injury to one of his fingers in consequence of the bursting of a bottle which he was engaged in filling. He brought an action of damages against the manufacturers, in which he averred that "in all aerated water manufactories the bursting of bottles is of constant occurrence, and it is the usual and proper precaution of the trade to supply the bottlers and other workers with rubber or worsted gloves and masks"; that it was the duty of the defenders to supply such gloves and masks; that they neglected this duty, and that in consequence of that neglect the pursuer received the injuries complained of. The pursuer further averred that the accident took place on the day after that on which he entered the defenders' employment, and that he had asked for gloves and a mask, and that his request had been refused by the defenders. Held that the action was relevant. Smith v. Forbes & Co., March 11, 1897, p. 699.

REPARATION—Continued.

Negligence—Master and Servant—Volenti non fit injuria—Risk voluntarily incurred to save another's life.

21. The father of a boy, thirteen years and four months old, raised an action against a coal company for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on account of injuries sustained by the boy when in the defenders' employment. The pursuer averred that while the boy and another employee of the defenders were standing on a coal waggon at the pithead of the defenders' pit trimming coal, an uncontrolled waggon was allowed (through the fault of a person entrusted with the superintendence of the shunting operations at the pithead) to approach the waggon on which the boy and his companion were standing at great speed on a down incline on the same line of rails; that the boy's companion, from his position on the stationary waggon, could not see the approaching waggon, but that the boy, "upon suddenly observing the near approach of the waggon running with great speed and force, in a moment of hurry and confusion, incident to his surroundings, and the extreme danger to himself and the said" companion, "jumped from the buffer of the stationary waggon, and seizing a wooden pit prop, about 5 or 6 feet in length, he 'snibbled' or stopped the waggon by inserting the prop between the spokes of one of the wheels and the body of the waggon. In doing so the momentum of the waggon caused one end of the prop to twist round with a sudden jerk, and, striking him on the stomach, threw him on his back, and his left arm falling on the rail, one of the waggon wheels passed over it from near the shoulder to the wrist. The waggon was stopped within 3 or 4 feet of the stationary waggon, and but for the piece of wood inserted in the wheel as aforesaid, . . . the two waggons would have come into violent collision, and been attended with great danger to the said" companion, "who was standing on the top of the coal in the stationary waggon, and also the said" boy. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue. Wilkinson v. Kinneil Cannel and Coking Coal Co., Limited, July 1, 1897, p. 1001.

Negligence—Master and Servant—Workman killed by fall of wall—Relevancy.

22. A mason having been killed by the fall of a wall which he was employed in building, his widow brought an action of damages at common law against his employers, the contractors for the mason work of the building, and averred that his death was due to the fault of the defenders, because—1. The wall was of weak and defective construction in respect (1) that the lime used contained an undue quantity of sand, and was insufficiently worked; and (2) that no proper "header" or binding stones were used in building it. 2. The defenders recklessly hurried on the building in spite of wet and unsuitable weather, and did not allow one course to be sufficiently dry before another was put on, with the result that the wall was in a very soft and raw condition. 3. While the wall was in this state, the defenders also, contrary to established custom, allowed the contractor for the carpenter work to drive "dooks" into the wall, with the result that the mason work was shaken and weakened. Held that no fault was relevantly averred against the defenders. Rae v. Milne & Sons, Nov. 20, 1896, p. 165.

REPARATION—Continued.

Negligence—Master and Servant—Relevancy—Proximate cause of injury—Allegation of incompetency of fellow-servant.

23. A pit-bottomer sued his employers and the engineman at the pit for damages for personal injuries, averring that while the pursuer was engaged at the bottom of the pit in replacing a hutch on the rails close to the cage, the engineman at the pithead, without awaiting a signal, raised the cage, which caught the pursuer and forced him upwards between the shaft and the scaffolding for three feet before the engine was stopped, and that he was thereby injured. He further averred that the derailment of the hutch was caused by defects in the rails, and that there was a defect in the checking power of the engine which prevented or hindered or interfered with its prompt stopping . . . and that the engineman was not sufficiently qualified for the duties entrusted to him. Held that there were no relevant averments of fault against the employers in respect that (1) the pursuer's averments shewed that the derailment of the hutch was not the proximate cause of the accident, and (2) the averments of defect in the engine and the want of sufficient experience on the part of the engineman were not sufficiently specific. Mackay v. John Watson, Limited, Jan. 20, 1897, p. 383.

Negligence—Master and Servant—Mines and Minerals—Defect in ways—Manholes—Employers Liability Act, 1880, sec. 1, subsec. 1, and sec. 2, subsec. 1—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, sec. 49—General Regulations 14 and 16.

24. Manholes constructed on the side of a roadway in a coal mine in terms of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, are part of the ways of the mine in the sense of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and if a manhole in a mine is obstructed by rubbish in such a way as to justify a miner employed in the mine in believing that the manhole cannot be used, and he is injured in consequence of not using it, his employer will be liable to him in damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, provided that the obstruction arose, or had not been discovered or remedied, owing to the negligence of the employer or of some person in his service entrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways were in proper condition. Ferris v. Cowdenbeath Coal Co., Limited, March 3, 1897, p. 615.

Negligence—Master and Servant—Master's liability for plant—Employers Liability Act, 1880, sec. 1, subsec. 1—Defect in "ways" and "works."

25. A labourer, employed by the contractor for the brickwork in an unfinished house, was injured by the breaking of a step while carrying a load of bricks up the stair of the house. In an action of damages brought by the labourer against his employer, on the ground that the step was defective, held that no negligence had been proved on the part of the defender, he being entitled to rely on the fact that the stair was constructed by a competent tradesman, and was the permanent stair of the house. M'Inulty v. Primrose, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 442.

Negligence—Master and Servant—Notice of injury—Reasonable excuse for want of notice—Employers Liability Act, 1880, sec. 4.

26. Action for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, dismissed, the Court holding that no reasonable excuse for the want of the statutory notice had been averred. M'Fadyen v. Dalmellington Iron Co., Limited, Jan. 16, 1897, p. 327.

See Lease, 7 to 11.

RES INTER ALIOS. See Agent and Principal, 3.

RES JUDICATA. See Church, 2—Railway, 1.

REVENUE. Succession-duty—Insurance Policy—Succession-Duty Act, 1853, secs. 2 and 17.

1. A father who had for many years paid the premiums upon policies of insurance on his own life, assigned the policies, seven years before his death, gratuitously, but absolutely, to his daughter, who, from the date of the assignment, kept up the policies by herself paying the premiums. Upon the father's death the Crown maintained that the assignment of the policies disposed of the moneys payable under them, so as to create a "succession" in the sense of section 2 of the Succession-Duty Act, 1853, and to make the daughter liable for succession-duty. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the daughter did not become entitled to the sum in the policy by the disposition of her father but partly by her own payment of premiums, and that the section did not apply. Lord Advocate v. Robertson, Feb. 18, 1897, H. L., p. 42.

Account-duty—Policy of insurance—Premiums—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, sec. 11.

2. A person who had for many years paid the premiums on an insurance policy on his own life for his own behoof, assigned it to his daughter, who thereafter paid the premiums. In a claim by the Crown against the daughter for account-duty, held (aff. judgment of First Division) that section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, did not apply, as the payments made by the father were not made for the benefit of a donee. Lord Advocate v. Robertson, Feb. 18, 1897, H. L., p. 42.

Income-Tax—Profits or Gains—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 100, Schedule D, First Case—City of Glasgow Bank (Liquidation) Act, 1882, sec. 17.

3. In order to enable the liquidation of the City of Glasgow Bank to be finally closed the Assets Company, Limited, was formed in 1882, and acquired from the liquidators the whole assets of the bank in return for a payment sufficient to discharge the outstanding liabilities of the bank, with the expenses of the liquidation, and a general undertaking to pay all debts of the bank which might afterwards emerge. These assets consisted of real and other properties and securities, and of sums which the liquidators expected to recover from the estates of contributories. At the date of the transference the assets stood in the books of the liquidators estimated at certain values, but these values did not represent the amount paid by the company, which would have been the same if the book values had been increased or diminished to any extent. The income of the company, as stated in the revenue accounts, consisted of the returns from these assets and investments. From time to time the company sold portions of the assets at prices exceeding the book values. The surpluses arising from such sales were not entered as income in the revenue accounts, but were credited to capital under the head of "suspense account for surplus assets." Large sums resulting from such sales and recoveries from debtors were carried to the credit of this account during each year subsequent to 1882, and in 1893 the directors, in terms of an interlocutor of the Court, distributed to the shareholders, from the sum standing in the suspense account, a sum of £15,000 as "repayment of surplus capital." The Inland Revenue claimed that the company were liable to income-tax for the year 1894-95 on the full amount of the sums carried to the credit of suspense account, and assessed the liability on an average of three years preceding 1894. In a case for appeal against the assessment, in which the foregoing facts were stated, held that as there was no statement of the price paid for each of the assets at the date of the transference, it was not possible to determine whether the realisation of the assets had resulted in a profit to the company. Assets Co., Limited, v. Inland Revenue, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 578.

REVENUE—Continued.

Income-tax—Company resident abroad trading in Scotland—Agent for foreign company assessed in his own name—Income-Tax Act, 1853, Schedule D—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 41.

4. The shipping company "Chanaral" (owners of the ship "Chanaral") was incorporated under Norwegian law in Norway, and had its registered office in Christiania, where the books were kept, and the two managers resided. The managers held two of the ninety-five shares of the company, the remainder being held by shareholders in Scotland. J. W. & Company, Glasgow, effected the whole of the chartering, kept the whole accounts, and intromitted with the whole funds, and paid on behalf of the management from the profits of the first voyage a dividend direct to the shareholders. Prior to April 1896 the ship had made one voyage from Rotterdam to various ports, ending at Liverpool. Income-tax assessment under Schedule D having been imposed upon "J. W. & Company for the 'Chanaral'" for the year ending 5th April 1896, J. W. & Company appealed. Held (1) that the company was resident abroad; (2) that the profits were derived from trade in this country, and were liable to assessment; and (3) that the assessment was right in point of form, it being unnecessary to designate J. W. & Company expressly as agents for the company. Wingate & Co. v. Inland Revenue, June 16, 1897, p. 939.

Income-Tax—Exemption—Theological College—"Public School"—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 61, Sched. A, Rule 6.

5. Held that a theological college which was intended primarily for the training of candidates for the ministry of the Free Church of Scotland and the regular students of which required either to be graduates or to have passed through a university course of arts before they were admitted to the college, was not a "public school" in the sense of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 61, Schedule A, rule 6. Inland Revenue v. General Trustees of the Church of Scotland, Feb. 4, 1897, p. 496.

Income-Tax—Exemption—Public Free Library—"Buildings used solely for the purposes" of Institution—Subscription Library—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 61, Sched. A, Rule 6.

6. In the buildings of the Dundee Free Library accommodation was given to books belonging to the Dundee Subscription Library, and the expenses attending their safekeeping and circulation among the subscribers were defrayed out of the revenues of the Free Library. In consideration of the accommodation and services so given, each book, after being in circulation for a year, became the property of the Free Library. Held that the buildings in question did not fall within the exemption contained in the Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 61, Sched. A, Rule 6, inasmuch as they were not used "solely" for the purposes of the Free Library. Inland Revenue v. Magistrates of Dundee, June 16, 1897, p. 930.

Inhabited house duty—Hall—The House-Tax Act, 1851—Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55, Schedule B, Rule V.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 13, subsec. 2.

7. Held (1) that the Free Church Assembly Hall and Free Church College were "halls or offices" within the meaning of Rule V. of Schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55, and, being charged for poor and school rates, were liable to inhabited house duty under the House-Tax Act, 1851; and (2) that the hall and college were not entitled to the exemption conferred by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, in respect that they were not occupied for the purposes of a business or calling, by which the occupier—the General Trustees of the Free

REVENUE—Continued.

Church—sought “a livelihood or profit.” General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v. Inland Revenue, Feb. 4, 1897, p. 492.

Exchequer Prosecutions—Court of Exchequer (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 6.

8. Question, whether an Exchequer prosecution must be tried by a jury.

Lord Advocate v. Thomson, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 543.

See Stamp.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. Pledge of documents of title—Delivery-orders—Factors Act, 1889, sec. 3—Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890, sec. 1.

Goldsmith, the owner of certain whisky in a bonded warehouse, for which he held the warrants of the warehouse-keeper, bearing that the whisky was held to the order of Goldsmith “or assigns by indorsement hereon,” borrowed a sum of money from Inglis, and granted him a letter bearing that he deposited the whisky with him in security of the loan, with power of sale. At the same time he indorsed and delivered the warrants to Inglis. Thereafter Robertson & Baxter, creditors of Goldsmith, arrested the whisky in the hands of the warehouse-keeper, who had received no intimation of the indorsement and delivery of the warrants to Inglis. In a competition for the whisky between Inglis, who founded on sec. 3 of the Factors Act, 1889, as giving him vi statuti constructive possession of the goods and a real right therein as pledgee, and Robertson & Baxter, founding on their arrestment, held (by a majority of the whole Court) that the claim of Robertson & Baxter, as arresting creditors, fell to be preferred. Robertson & Baxter v. Inglis, March 18, 1897, p. 758.

See Sale, 1—Stamp, 2—Trust, 9.

RIVER, LOCH, AND SEA. See Lease, 5—Police, 6, 7, 8—Superior and Vassal, 2 to 5.

ROAD. Authority to take materials from enclosed land—Specification of time and place—Blasting—General Turnpike Act, 1831, sec. 80.

1. A district committee of a county council served a notice upon a proprietor intimating that they intended, in the exercise of their statutory powers, to take road material from an enclosed field upon his estate, at a spot which “will on application by you to . . . the road surveyor of the said district, be . . . specifically pointed out on a map of the locality or on the ground.” In the course of the proceedings before the Sheriff which followed upon the notice, it appeared that the intention of the committee was to carry an existing quarry on unenclosed ground westwards into the proprietor’s enclosed land, and the spot where the enclosed land would be entered upon was pointed out on a map of the locality. The Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor finding that the committee were “entitled to proceed with their proposed operations, but under the restriction and condition” that, if the operations were carried more than fifty yards into the enclosed land they should provide a service bridge to give the proprietor access from one side of the workings to the other, and that no blasting should take place when agricultural work was being carried on within 100 yards of the spot where the blast was to be made. The extract decree bore, inter alia, that the Sheriff found that the committee were entitled to search for, dig, and carry away road material from the proprietor’s enclosed land at a spot which would be pointed out by the road surveyor on application by the proprietor. In an action by the proprietor for reduction of the notice, interlocutor, and extract, held (1) that the spot at which the material was to be taken was sufficiently identified as that which had been pointed out in the proceedings before the Sheriff; (2) that it was not necessary that any time limit should be imposed on the proposed operations, either in the notice or the decree; (3) that blasting, as a usual and necessary method of quarrying, was authorised by the statute ; and (4) that the insertion by the Sheriff of the condition as to the erection of a service bridge was not a good ground for reducing the decree. Whitson v. Blairgowrie District Committee, Feb. 6, 1897, p. 519.

ROAD—Continued.

Servitude—Grant of access by passage within burgh—Right of owner of passage to diminish its breadth.

2. From 1728 onwards the titles of a house situated in a close or passage in Elgin contained the following clause, "with free egress and regress by the front passage from the High Street." In 1896 this close was a cul-de-sac, entirely surrounded by walls, and of irregular breadth, varying from 6 feet 10 inches at the entrance from the street up to 9 feet 4 inches. The owner of the solum of the close having in that year proposed to diminish the width of the close for some distance from the entrance to 3 feet 9 inches, the owners of the house brought an action of declarator against him. It was proved that from time immemorial the close had been of the dimensions and character specified. Held that the right of the pursuers was a right of egress and regress by the close, as it had existed from time immemorial, and therefore that the defender was not entitled to diminish its width. Grigor v. Maclean, Nov. 4, 1896, p. 86.

Public right of way—Title to Sue—Railway, 6.

3. Held by Lord Low, Ordinary, that a railway company had no title to sue a declarator of right of way in the public interest. Park Yard Co., Limited, v. North British Railway Co., July 17, 1897, p. 1148.

RUNNING POWERS. See Railway, 6.SALE. Sale of Moveables—Sale or Security—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 61, subsec. 4.

1. Evidence on a consideration of which held that the parties intended a transaction to operate as a security over moveables and not as a sale. Robertson v. Hall's Trustee, Nov. 10, 1896, p. 120.

Sale of moveables—Right of inspection before taking delivery.

2. In an action by the seller of herrings in barrels against the buyer for the price, held that, while the defender, having inspected the herrings before purchasing, would not have been entitled to a second inspection with the view of ascertaining whether they were of the quality specified in the contract, his right to inspect them before taking delivery for the purpose of identifying them as in fact the herrings purchased by him was absolute ; that the pursuer was not entitled to refuse the defender's demand for an inspection on the ground that the defender intended to use the inspection for an illegitimate purpose ; that the pursuer, having refused to allow any inspection, was therefore in breach of contract ; and that the defender fell to be assoilzied. Chalmers v. Paterson, July 2, 1897, p. 1020.

Sale of Moveables—Clause of Reference.

3. On 27th May 1895 A, a member of the Beetroot Sugar Association, by contract with B, who was not a member, sold to him sugar at 10s. 9d. per cwt., to be delivered in October-December 1895. The contract incorporated the rules of the association as fully as if these had been expressly inserted therein, and further provided that the Council of the London Association was the referee of all disputes. Rule 32 provided,—“If any member liable on the face of unmatured contracts shall suspend payment . . . the Council of the United Kingdom Association to which he belongs shall, as soon as possible after the suspension . . . meet, fix, and publish official quotations and due dates for all periods of delivery that may be in question ; the prices to be according to the average buying and selling market value of the day on which the member defaulted or suspended payment. The contracts in question shall then be closed upon the terms so fixed." A suspended payment in June 1895, and the Council of the London Association fixed the market price of sugar at 10s. 3d., at which the contract fell to be closed, the purchaser, if the rule applied, thus becoming liable for the difference between that and the contract price. B refused to pay the difference, alleging that rule 32 only applied to contracts between members. A, after intimation to B, referred the dispute to the London Council, who decided that the rule applied, and ordained B to pay the sum so fixed. In an action by A for implement of the award, held that under the contract the Council was constituted referee of all disputes, and that their decision was final. Stewart, Brown, & Co. v. Grime, Jan. 27, 1897, p. 414.

SALE—Continued.

Sale of Moveables—Breach of contract by buyer—Measure of damage—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 53, subsec. 2.

4. A ropemaker agreed to supply at a certain price 20 tons of rope of a special quality in such quantities as the purchaser should from time to time order, but on condition that the whole should be taken within a certain time. The special quality of rope was not kept in stock by the seller, but was made from time to time as each order was sent. The purchaser having failed to order the whole of the 20 tons within the time specified, the seller raised an action of damages for his loss of profit on the quantity which had not been ordered. Held that the true measure of the damages to which the seller was entitled was the difference between the contract price and the cost to the seller of the raw material plus the cost of manufacture. Govan Rope and Sail Co., Limited, v. Weir & Co., Jan. 19, 1897, p. 368.

Sale of Moveables—Contract for successive deliveries of goods—Failure of buyer to take delivery—Defence that goods previously delivered disconform to contract.

5. In an action of damages by a seller for breach of a contract for the supply of a specified quantity of goods, of which delivery was to be taken as required, subject to the proviso that delivery of the whole should be taken before a certain date, the buyer sought to justify his failure to take delivery on the ground that particular lots of goods delivered under the contract had not been of the stipulated quality. Opinion per Lord Adam that the defence was relevant, although at the date when he should have taken delivery the buyer was not aware of the defect in the goods previously supplied. Govan Rope and Sail Co., Limited, v. Weir & Co., Jan. 19, 1897, p. 368.

Sale of Moveables—Disconformity to contract—Rejection—Right to retain goods and set up breach of warranty in extinction of price—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 11, subsec. 2, and secs. 35 and 53.

6. Held (1) that where the purchaser of a machine intimated rejection of it as disconform to contract, and thereafter continued to use it for three months, he was not entitled to found on his alleged rejection; and (2) that the purchaser having elected to reject was not entitled thereafter to fall back upon the alternative remedy provided by the Sale of Goods Act of retaining the machine and claiming compensation on the ground that the seller had failed to perform a material part of the contract. Electric Construction Co., Limited, v. Hurry & Young, Jan. 14, 1897, p. 312.

Sale of heritage—Objection to title—Inhibitions—Obligation to clear record.

7. In an action by a purchaser of heritage for implement of an obligation by the seller's agents to produce searches shewing a clear record, the defenders tendered searches which disclosed two inhibitions used against the seller prior to the date of the disposition by him. The defenders alleged that the inhibitions were invalid. Held that whether the inhibi-

SHIP—Continued.

"inherent deterioration"—Agent and Principal—Deviation from charter-party by charterers' agent—Ultra vires.

5. By charter-party a steamship was chartered to proceed to Seville and there load from the charterers or their agents 1500 half chests of oranges, and being so loaded to proceed to Leith direct, and deliver the same agreeably to bills of lading, "the steamer to have liberty before loading fruit to load lead or mineral, also cork-wood, for owners' benefit, the same to be discharged after fruit." A marginal note on the charter-party bore that the captain was to apply to F. G. for cargo. The bills of lading for the fruit bore that it had been shipped "in good order and well conditioned," and took the shipowners bound to deliver it in the like good order and condition, subject to special exceptions, including "not responsible for . . . inherent deterioration." By agreement between F. G. and the master of the steamer, the fruit was loaded before, and was also to some extent discharged after, the mineral and the corkwood, with the result that the fruit was about six days longer in the hold than it would have been had the vessel been loaded in terms of the charter-party. The fruit having been delivered at Leith in a deteriorated condition, the charterers brought an action for damages against the shipowners, pleading that the damage had been caused by the undue detention of the fruit in the hold of the ship consequent on the deviation from the charter-party. The defenders maintained that they were not liable, in respect that the damage had arisen from the "inherent deterioration" of the fruit, and further, that F. G. having agreed that the order of loading should be varied from that provided in the charter-party, the pursuers were not entitled to found on any damage resulting from the variation. Held, after a proof (1) that the agreement between F. G. and the master was not binding on the pursuers, and (2) that the defenders were liable in respect that they had undertaken to deliver in good order and condition, and had failed to do so, or to prove that the damage was due to one of the excepted causes. Lindsay & Son v. Scholefield, Feb. 19, 1897, p. 530.

Charter-party—Construction—Commission—Commission on freight payable to charterers.

6. By charter-party the owner agreed "on the chartering to arrive of" a vessel then on a voyage from New York to Shanghai for a voyage as follows:—"The said vessel shall after discharge of inward cargo or ballast be made ready, and shall receive on board at Portland, Oregon, and/or other loading-places as hereinafter provided, a full and complete cargo. . . . Should the vessel fail to arrive at Portland, Oregon, at or before 6 o'clock P.M. on or before 31st January 1896, charterers to have the option of cancelling or maintaining this charter on the arrival of vessel." The concluding clause of the charter-party was as follows:—"A commission of three and three-quarters per cent shall be paid to charterers on the estimated gross freight in U. S. gold coin . . . on the completion of loading, or should vessel be lost." The vessel was lost on the voyage from New York to Shanghai. Founding on the last clause above quoted, the charterers raised an action against the shipowners for the amount of the commission on the estimated gross freight. Held that it was a condition precedent of the whole contract that the vessel should arrive at the port of loading, and that as that condition had not been purified the defenders fell to be assoltized. Sibson & Kerr v. Ship "Barcraig" Co., Limited, Nov. 4, 1896, p. 91.

Charter-party—Agent and Principal—Ultra vires—Relief.

7. The charterer of a ship having litigated unsuccessfully with the shipowners a question as to the mode of discharge depending on the terms of the charter-party, and having been found liable in demurrage and expenses, brought an action for relief against the shipping-agent, through whom he had effected the charter, on the ground that the shipping-agent had taken the charter-party in the terms in which it was taken contrary to instructions. Held that the shipping-agent was not liable, in respect the loss had not been caused by his failure to take the charter-party in terms of his instructions but by the pursuer's failure to take delivery in terms of the charter-party. Barkley & Sons v. Simpson, Jan. 16, 1897, p. 346.

SHIP—Continued.

SHORE. See Superior and Vassal, 2 to 5.

SLANDER. See Reparation, 5 to 10.

SPECIAL CASE. See Process, 38, 39.

SPECIFIC IMPLEM. See Process, 18, 33.

SPEES SUCCESSIONIS. See Bankruptcy, 7.

STAMP. Necessity for stamp—Stamp Act, 1891, secs. 33 (1), 101 (1), and First Schedule, voce Agreement—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, secs. 3, 10, 89.

1. A, a claimant in a sequestration, produced a document in the following terms:—"Borrowed from A, £67 Pounds, July 1878. Paid back £5 Pounds, May 1885. Leaving a balance of £62 Pounds to pay still." The document was holograph of and signed by the bankrupt, but was neither dated nor stamped. Held that the document was neither a promissory-note, nor an agreement, nor a receipt, within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that it might be received as an item of evidence in support of A's claim without a stamp. Todd v. Wood, July 14, 1897, p. 1104.

Conveyance on Sale—Decree under Heritable Securities Act, 1894, sec. 8—Stamp Act, 1891, secs. 54, 57, and 62.

2. Held that an instrument for completing a feudal title in the form of an extract of a decree by a Sheriff under section 8 of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894, declaring the debtor's right of redemption under a bond and disposition in security to be extinguished and the creditor vested in the property at a price under the sum due on the bond, was not a decree whereby property was transferred "upon the sale thereof" in terms of section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and was accordingly not liable to an ad valorem duty, but that it fell under section 62 of the Act, in respect that it had the effect of transferring and vesting in the creditor, otherwise than by sale or mortgage, a right of property which had previously been vested in the borrower, and was liable accordingly to a stamp-duty of ten shillings. Tod v. Inland Revenue, June 16, 1897, p. 934.

Penalties for insufficient stamping—Action for penalties against individual partners of firm—Contract-note.

3. The Lord Advocate laid an information against A and B, stockbrokers, carrying on business under the firm name of A, B, & Company, charging "both and each or one or other of them" with having on occasions specified issued contract-notes in the said firm name which were not duly stamped, contrary to the Statutes 54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39, sections 1 and 53 (2) and 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 7, section 3, whereby the said A and B had "both and each or one or other of them" incurred fines to amounts stated. The defenders objected that the information was incompetent as laid, in respect that there was no conclusion against the firm. Held that the information was well laid. Lord Advocate v. Thomson, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 543.

STATUTE. Retrospective operation—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 2—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, sec. 2.

1. Opinion (per Lord Kincairney) that section 2 of the Trusts (Scotland)

STATUTE—Continued.

Amendment Act, 1884, was declaratory, and therefore retrospective in its effect. Scott v. Craig's Representatives, Jan. 29, 1897, p. 462.

Foreign—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867.

2. The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, does not apply to English trusts. Carruthers' Trustees—Allan's Trustees, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 238.

Repeal—Statute Law Revision Act, 1892.

3. A complaint libelled a contravention of section 26 of the Excise Licences Act of 1825, "as altered or amended by the 8th and 9th sections of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853." The 8th and 9th sections of the Act of 1853 were repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892. Held that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that it was founded on sections of a statute which had been repealed. Morrison v. Stubbs, June 8, 1897, Just. Cases, p. 61.

See Assignment—Fishings, 1—Police, 5.

STATUTES.

1669, cap. 9. See Prescription.

1696, cap. 5. See Bankruptcy, 1 to 7.

48 Geo. III. cap. 55 (House-Tax Act, 1808). See Revenue, 7.

6 Geo. IV. cap. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825). See Process, 28, 29.

9 Geo. IV. cap. 58 (Home Drummond Act, 1828). See Public-House, 1.

1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 43 (General Turnpike Act, 1841). See Road, 1.

2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68 (Day Trespass Act, 1832). See Justiciary Cases, 31.

1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114 (Personal Diligence Act, 1838). See Poinding.

5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35 (Income-Tax Act, 1842). See Revenue, 3 to 6.

8 and 9 Vict. cap. 19 (Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845). See Railway, 3.

8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83 (Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845). See Poor.

12 and 13 Vict. cap. 51 (Pupils Protection Act, 1849). See Judicial Factor, 2.

13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850). See Process, 2.

14 and 15 Vict. cap. 36 (House-Tax Act, 1851). See Revenue, 7.

16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34 (Income-Tax Act, 1853). See Revenue, 4.

16 and 17 Vict. cap. 51 (Succession-Duty Act, 1853). See Revenue, 1.

17 and 18 Vict. cap. 31 (Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854). See Railway, 8.

17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91 (Valuation of Lands Act, 1854). See Public Burden—Valuation Acts, 3.

19 and 20 Vict. cap. 56 (Court of Exchequer Act, 1856). See Revenue, 8.

19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79 (Bankruptcy Act, 1856). See Bankruptcy.

20 and 21 Vict. cap. 19 (Bankruptcy and Real Securities Act, 1857). See Bankruptcy, 2.

20 and 21 Vict. c. 72 (Police Act, 1857). See Police Force, 1.

20 and 21 Vict. cap. cxlviii. (Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857). See Justiciary Cases, 33.

25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35 (Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862). See Justiciary Cases, 5, 21.

25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89 (Companies Act, 1862). See Company, 7.

25 and 26 Vict. cap. 97 (Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862). See Fishings.

25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101 (General Police and Improvement Act, 1862). See Police, 5.

26 and 27 Vict. cap. 87 (Savings Banks Acts Amendment Act, 1863). See Bank.

26 and 27 Vict. cap. 108 (Vaccination Act, 1863). See Justiciary Cases, 23—Public Health, 1.

27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53 (Summary Procedure Act, 1864). See Justiciary Cases.

29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii. (Glasgow Police Act, 1866). See Burgh, 5, 6.

STATUTES—Continued.

- 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97 (Trusts Act, 1867). See Trust, 7, 11.
- 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101 (Public Health Act, 1867). See Lease, 4.
- 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 131 (Companies Act, 1867). See Company, 1, 6.
- 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48 (Representation of the People Act, 1868). See Election Law, 1, 2, 4.
- 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 54 (Judgments Extension Act, 1868). See Process, 9.
- 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868). See Process.
- 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123 (Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868). See Fishings, 1.
- 34 and 35 Vict. cap. 38 (Public Health Amendment Act, 1871). See Police, 7.
- 34 and 35 Vict. cap. 56 (Dogs Act, 1871). See Justiciary Cases, 3.
- 36 and 37 Vict. cap. 48 (Regulation of Railways Act, 1873). See Railway, 8.
- 36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63 (Law-Agents Act, 1873). See Administration of Justice, 2, 3.
- 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94 (Conveyancing Act, 1874). See Writ, 1.
- 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62 (Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875). See Justiciary Cases, 35, 37.
- 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63 (Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875). See Justiciary Cases, 10, 11—Public Health, 2.
- 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 26 (Publicans Certificate Act, 1876). See Public-House, 2.
- 40 and 41 Vict. cap. 26 (Companies Act, 1877). See Company, 6.
- 40 and 41 Vict. cap. 50 (Sheriff Courts Act, 1877). See Bankruptcy, 2.
- 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 15 (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878). See Revenue, 7.
- 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 33 (Dentists Act, 1878). See Justiciary Cases, 30.
- 42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30 (Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879). See Justiciary Cases, 10, 11—Public Health, 2.
- 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34 (Debtors Act, 1880). See Justiciary Cases, 25 to 28.
- 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42 (Employers Liability Act, 1880). See Reparation, 24, 25, 26.
- 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 47 (Ground Game Act, 1880). See Justiciary Cases, 31.
- 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21 (Married Women's Property Act, 1881). See Marriage-Contract, 1.
- 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 22 (Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881). See Bankruptcy, 15.
- 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33 (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881). See Justiciary Cases.
- 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61 (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882). See Bill of Exchange, 1—Stamp, 1.
- 45 and 46 Vict. cap. clii. (City of Glasgow Bank Liquidation Act, 1882). See Assignment.
- 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 51 (Corrupt Practices Act, 1883). See Election Law, 5 to 9.
- 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 57 (Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883). See Trade-Mark.
- 47 and 48 Vict. cap. 63 (Trusts Amendment Act, 1884). See Trust, 8.
- 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3 (Representation of the People Act, 1884). See Election Law, 3.
- 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 16 (Registration Amendment Act, 1885). See Election Law, 2.
- 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29 (Crofters Holdings Act, 1886). See Crofter.
- 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35 (Criminal Procedure Act 1887). See Justiciary Cases, 25.
- 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58 (Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887). See Reparation, 24.

STATUTES—Continued.

- 51 and 52 Vict. cap. 25 (Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888). See Railway, 8.
- 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23 (Herring Fishery Act, 1889). See Justiciary Cases, 34.
- 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 45 (Factors Act, 1889). See Right in Security.
- 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50 (Local Government Act, 1889). See Police Force, 1.
- 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 7 (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889). See Revenue, 2.
- 53 and 54 Vict. cap. 40 (Factors Act, 1890). See Right in Security.
- 54 and 55 Vict. cap. 30 (Law-Agents and Notaries Public Act, 1891). See Agent and Client, 6.
- 54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39 (Stamp Act, 1891). See Stamp, 1, 2.
- 54 and 55 Vict. cap. cxxvi. (Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891). See Burgh, 9.
- 55 and 56 Vict. cap. 19 (Statute Law Revision Act, 1892). See Justiciary Cases, 7.
- 55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55 (Burgh Police Act, 1892). See Burgh, 1, 2, 3, 7—Police, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10.
- 55 and 56 Vict. cap. lxxiii. (North British Railway, &c. Order Confirmation Act, 1892). See Railway, 9.
- 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71 (Sale of Goods Act, 1893). See Sale, 1, 4, 6.
- 56 and 57 Vict. cap. cliv. (Edinburgh Improvement and Municipal and Police Act, 1893). See Burgh, 9.
- 56 and 57 Vict. cap. clxxix (Caledonian Railway Act, 1893). See Railway, 10.
- 57 and 58 Vict. cap. 44 (Heritable Securities Act, 1894). See Stamp, 2.
- 57 and 58 Vict. cap. 58 (Local Government Act, 1894). See Valuation Acts, 4.
- 57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60 (Merchant Shipping Act, 1894). See Ship, 4.
- 58 and 59 Vict. cap. 41 (Lands Valuation Amendment Act, 1895). See Valuation Acts, 2.

STREET. See Burgh, 5, 6—Police, 3, 4, 5.

SUCCESSION. Legitim—Discharge of legitim.

1. A bankrupt executed a deed of discharge whereby, on the narrative that he had received various advances of money from his father, and that it was reasonable and proper that "in respect of such advances" he should execute the discharge after written, he exonerated and discharged his father, his heirs and executors, of any legitim which he could claim through the death of his father. Held that the deed was not to be construed as conditional upon the father's claim for repayment of the advances being discharged, but was a gratuitous discharge of the son's right to legitim. Obers v. Paton's Trustees, March 17, 1897, p. 719.

Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Sale of heritage by factor loco tutoris—Minor's power to test on proceeds of sale.

2. A minor pubes may dispose by will of moveable property belonging to him as a surrogatum for heritage. Brown's Trustee v. Brown, June 18, 1897, p. 962.

Testament—Holograph Writing.

3. Terms of two holograph writings which were found in the repositories of a deceased person who left a formal settlement, held not to be testamentary. Waddell's Trustees v. Waddell, Dec. 2, 1896, p. 189.

Testament—Destination in moveable bond.

4. B invested money belonging partly to himself and partly to A in a moveable bond payable to A and B and the survivor. In a question between A's executor and B, held, after proof, that A had authorised the investment in these terms, and that the destination operated as a bequest by A in favour of B. Paterson's Judicial Factor v. Paterson's Trustees, Feb. 4, 1897, p. 499.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Testament—Destination—Effect of general settlement on prior special destination.

5. Held that a will revoking all deeds of settlement, and declaring the testator's wish that her estate should go to her heirs whomsoever, was not to be construed as revoking the special destination in a moveable bond taken by the testator, although its effect was testamentary. Paterson's Judicial Factor v. Paterson's Trustees, Feb. 4, 1897, p. 499.

Testament—Revocation—Conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit.

6. A, sixteen months after his marriage, executed a will, by which he left his whole estate to his wife. Five years later a child was born of the marriage, and fourteen months afterwards A died. Held that the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit applied, and that the will became inoperative on the birth of the child. M'Kie's Tutor v. M'Kie, Feb. 16, 1897, p. 526.

Testament—"My heir"—Executor—Competition.

7. A holograph will provided, inter alia,—"My cousin Thomas Forrest is to be my heir." Then followed pecuniary legacies. Mrs Jerdon, the testator's sister, craved to be appointed executrix-dative qua next of kin of the testatrix. Thomas Forrest craved confirmation as executor-nominate, or as executor-dative qua general disponent and universal legatory of the deceased. The Court preferred the claim of Mrs Jerdon, on the ground that it was not clear from the terms of the will that the testatrix had conferred on Thomas Forrest the character claimed by him. Jerdon v. Forrest, Jan. 23, 1897, p. 395.

Testament—Construction.

8. General power of sale—Prohibition in codicil against selling a particular subject—Petition for power to sell—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867. Marshall's Trustees, Jan. 30, 1897, p. 478.

Testament—Construction—"Issue."

9. Held that a destination to a person's "issue" in the ordinary case includes not children only but direct descendants of every degree, per stirpes. Turner's Trustees v. Turner, March 4, 1897, p. 619; cf. M'Murdo's Trustees v. M'Murdo, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 458.

Substitution in moveables—Evacuation—Fee or Liferent—Repugnancy.

10. Terms of a general disposition and settlement on a construction of which held that on the death of the testator his wife became absolute owner of his whole estate, and that it passed on her death to her next of kin—diss. Lord Moncreiff, on the ground that, on a sound construction of the husband's settlement, the wife became fiar of his estate, with a substitution in favour of legatees named, which substitution had not been evacuated. Bell's Executor v. Borthwick, July 15, 1897, p. 1120.

Liferent and Fee—Power—Conveyance to liferentrix with power of disposal "during her life."

11. Certain heritable property was conveyed to M. for her liferent use only, and to her children in fee, with the declaration that "it shall be lawful to and in the power of the said M. by herself alone, during her life, to sell, burden, or otherwise dispose, onerously or gratuitously, of the said subjects as she may think proper." Held that the power did not entitle her to dispose of the subjects by a mortis causa deed. Miller's Trustees v. Findlay, Nov. 6, 1896, p. 114.

Liferent or Fee—Residue—Direction to trustees to invest for behoof of A and pay interest—Right to renounce liferent.

12. In his trust-disposition and settlement executed in 1858 a testator who had three daughters, one married and two unmarried, directed his trustees, previous to their dividing the residue of his estate, "to set apart and invest" in their own names £1600 in two sums of £800 each "for behoof of" his two unmarried daughters M and W, "the interest thereof to be paid to them respectively so long as they remain unmarried," declaring that in the event of either of them contracting marriage or dying, the interest on the sum "effeiring to such daughter" should be paid to the other so long as she remained unmarried. The testator further authorised his trustees to pay to each daughter on her marriage a sum not exceeding £200 "out of the said sum of £1600" for outfit, and then directed his trustees after payment of his debts, and "after investing the said sum of £1600," to make over the residue of his estate to his three daughters, share and share alike, "but deducting from the shares of my said children . . . any sum . . . that may have been paid by my said trustees to any of my said daughters for outfit in the event of the marriage of either of them." In the event of any of the children dying before the period of division, her share was to accrue to the survivor. The testator was survived by his three daughters. Held (1) that the provision in the residuary clause that the sums paid by the trustees for marriage outfit from the £1600 should be deducted from M and W's shares of residue shewed the testator's intention that the fee of the £1600 should form part of the residue, and that it fell to be disposed of accordingly, and (2) that the unmarried daughters were entitled to renounce their liferents of the £1600, and to obtain immediate payment of their shares of the capital thereof as residue. Whitehead's Trustees v. Whitehead, July 6, 1897, p. 1032.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Liferent and Fee—"Free liferent use of residue"—Profits of law business—Income or Capital.

13. A law-agent in his trust-settlement directed that his widow should "enjoy the free liferent use and enjoyment of the residue" of his estate. Under a contract of copartnery current at his death his trustees were entitled to receive from his surviving partner a share of the future profits of his business for several years. Held that the share of profits did not belong to the widow as income, but fell as capital into residue. Freer's Trustees v. Freer, Jan. 28, 1897, p. 437.

Conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit—Bequest by uncle to nephew and niece.

14. Held that the conditio si sine liberis applied to a legacy to a nephew, there being nothing in the settlement to shew that the testator was moved to select his nephews and nieces as objects of his bounty by any other consideration than their relationship to him. Waddell's Trustees v. Waddell, Dec. 2, 1896, p. 189.

Vesting—Marriage-contract—Vesting of provision to children—Clause of survivorship—Power of appointment—Acceleration of vesting by deed of appointment.

15. Terms of a marriage-contract on a construction of which held that the persons entitled under the marriage-contract to the fee of the estate conveyed by the wife, in the event of a power of appointment not being exercised, were the children alive at the death of the longest liver of the spouses, and the issue of such as might have predeceased that date; that these persons were the sole objects of the power of appointment; and therefore that the trustee under the marriage-contract was bound to hold the estate conveyed by the wife (who had survived her husband) until her death. Cuming's Trustee v. Cuming, Nov. 14, 1896, p. 153.

Vesting—Clause of survivorship.

16. Held, on a construction of a trust-disposition and settlement, that the presumption that a clause of survivorship referred to the period of distribution had been excluded by evidence of a contrary intention in the deed, and that the children's shares of residue vested in them a morte testatoris. Wood v. Neill's Trustees, Nov. 6, 1896, p. 105.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Vesting—Fee or Liferent—Direction to trustees to retain.

17. Terms of a trust-disposition and settlement on a construction of which held that on the death of the truster's widow the fee of a daughter's share vested in her, subject only to the effect of the direction to settle her share in the event of her marriage. Mackay's Trustees v. Mackay's Trustees, June 8, 1897, p. 904.

Vesting—Power to trustees to postpone division or to make interim divisions—Survivorship.

18. A testator, after directing his trustees to pay certain alimentary annuities, directed that "after the foregoing purposes are served" his trustees should divide the residue of his estate equally, share and share alike, among his surviving children nominatim, and the children of a deceased daughter, "such children coming in the place of their mother and receiving equally among them the share that would have fallen to her if she had survived me, and formed one of my residuary legatees, and to the survivors of my said five children and grandchildren; declaring that, in the event of any of my children before named, or grandchildren before referred to, dying prior to the division of said residue, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall succeed equally, share and share alike, to that portion of my said means and estate which would have devolved on their parent under the destination above written, and as if such parent had survived said period of division." The testator empowered his trustees to sell all or any portion of his estates at such times as they might consider advantageous, and to set aside sufficient investments for payment of the annuities, if they thought proper. He further empowered them to postpone the division of the residue until the whole had been realised, or to make interim divisions as the realisation proceeded. Held that the whole residue vested in the children and grandchildren of the testator at the date of his death. Maclean's Trustees v. Maclean, June 29, 1897, p. 988.

Vesting—Direction to pay on attainment of majority.

19. A testator directed his trustees to make payment to his nephew, D. M., of a legacy of £60,000, "and that in liferent for his liferent use only, and on his death I direct the said sum of £60,000 to be paid to and among his children equally among them, share and share alike, on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one, payable as such children, after their father's death, respectively attain majority, the interest or annual produce being, however, in the meantime, available for their maintenance and education, the issue of any of the said children who may have predeceased taking their parent's share." D. M. predeceased the testator. Held that the fee of the £60,000 vested equally in all D. M.'s children at the testator's death, irrespective of their attainment of majority. Mackinnon's Trustees v. MacNeill, June 29, 1897, p. 981.

Vesting—Payment—Discretion of trustees.

20. Terms of a bequest of a share of residue to a son on a construction of which held that no part of the capital of the son's share had vested in him except the sums paid to him by the trustees. Russell v. Bell's Trustees, March 5, 1897, p. 666.

See Writ, 1.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Entry—Corporation—"Managers and their successors in office."

1. The Orphan Hospital and Workhouse at Edinburgh, incorporated by royal letters-patent, having purchased certain lands, the superior, by charter of resignation, disposed the lands "to and in favour of the managers of" the corporation "and their successors in office for the use and behoof of the said hospital and their dispoonees, heritably and irredeemably," and infeftment was taken in these terms. Held that the entry so given was an entry of the corporation, and was not an entry of individuals as trustees for the corporation. Earl of Lauderdale v. Hogg, June 10, 1897, p. 914.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Barony Title—Crown—Sea—Submarine Coal—Prescription.

2. In a question between the Crown and a vassal, held (1) that the grant of a barony, with parts and pertinents, cannot, apart from prescriptive possession explaining the grant otherwise, be construed to carry the coal under the bed of the sea ex adverso of the barony lands; but (2) that, if coal below low-water mark has been openly worked from barony lands for more than the prescriptive period, such possession is sufficient to shew that the coal below low-water mark, so far as the same is workable from the barony lands and within the lateral boundaries of the barony, was included in the original grant. Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 216.

Title—Grant of coal infra fluxum maris.

3. A grant of land adjoining the seashore, with the privilege of working the coal infra fluxum maris, confers a right to work the coal underneath the foreshore, but implies an exclusion of any right to coal beyond low-water mark, so that possession of such coal is possession without a title. Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 216.

Title—Disjunction of united barony by division of superiority.

4. By crown charter of resignation and novodamus granted in 1651 the three baronies of W., E., and M. which were separately described, were united into a single united barony. Upon the restoration of Episcopacy in 1662 the superiority of the barony of M., which was within the regality of St Andrews, reverted to the Archbishop of St Andrews, and the vassal resigned the lands to the archbishop, and obtained a charter from him. At the Revolution the superiority again passed to the Crown, and crown charters of the whole lands of W., E., and M. were subsequently granted to the vassal. These charters, however, did not re-erect the three baronies into a single barony. Held that, as a barony cannot be held of different superiors, M. ceased to be part of the united barony in 1662, and that, as it had never been re-united therewith, possession of submarine coal ex adverso of the lands of W. could not be founded on to instruct a title to such coal ex adverso of the lands of M. Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 216.

Barony—Crown—Union of baronies with different titles—Possession.

5. A crown charter of resignation and novodamus erected three baronies, W., E., and M., which were separately described, into a united barony, but did not expressly make any additional grant. The description of the lands of W. contained no boundary seawards. After the union of the baronies the proprietor worked the coal under the bed of the sea beyond low-water mark ex adverso of W. for the prescriptive period. Opinion by Lord Adam that the proprietor was not entitled to found on this possession further than as explaining his title to W. Wemyss' Trustees v. Lord Advocate, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 216.

Building Restrictions—Right of one vassal to enforce restrictions against another—Jus quesitum tertio.

6. Held that the reference to a common plan and scheme of building in a feu-charter was sufficient to shew that the restrictions were imposed and accepted for the benefit not merely of the superior, but also of the body of feuars, and that the other feuars were entitled to enforce them. Johnston v. The Walker Trustees, July 10, 1897, p. 1061.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.Building Restrictions—Acquiescence.

7. Evidence on a consideration of which held that building restrictions were still binding notwithstanding alleged deviations therefrom. Johnston v. The Walker Trustees, July 10, 1897, p. 1061.

Building Restrictions.

8. Prohibition against building on vacant ground used as a back-green—Whether prohibition affected portion of back-green occupied at date of disposition by a small building not separately conveyed. Lawson v. Wilkie, March 4, 1897, p. 649.

Building Restrictions—Ground-annual.

9. By contracts of ground-annual, the City of Glasgow Bank-disponed certain building lots in Carlton Terrace, Glasgow, part of the lands of North Woodside, belonging to the bank. By the contracts, the disponees were taken bound in the second place to “erect on the said steading of ground hereby disponed a good and substantial dwelling-house of stone and lime”; “(third), the front of the house or houses to be erected . . . shall be placed upon the building line, and in all parts and portions thereof shall be built, erected, and finished in every respect in conformity with the designs and building plans” “so as not to be inferior in character and design” to the houses already built on Carlton Terrace, “the first party (the City of Glasgow Bank) being bound to take their disponees in the other steadings fronting Carlton Terrace already built upon, or yet to be built upon, bound to observe similar conditions and to maintain and erect houses not inferior in character and design to the houses built as aforesaid”; “and further, declaring that the second party in building shall be bound to conform to the general feuing-plan of North Woodside; and the first party bind themselves and their successors to insert in all future conveyances to be granted by them or their foresaids of their said lands of North Woodside, as shewn on the said feuing-plan, similar conditions, provisions, obligations, and others, as herein expressed.” Held that, as regarded the unbuilt-on lots in Carlton Terrace, the pursuers were entitled to erect tenements of dwelling-houses, provided that in doing so they observed the existing building line in front, and that the houses so to be erected were not inferior in character and design to the houses already built and forming part of said terrace; but that, as regarded the rest of the lands of North Woodside, the pursuers were entitled to erect tenements of dwelling-houses and shops. Assets Co., Limited, v. Ogilvie, Jan. 23, 1897, p. 400.

Building Restrictions—Process—Declarator.

10. In an action for declarator that certain building ground within a burgh was not subject to any building restrictions, the Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the ground was subject to certain restrictions and not to others, but he pronounced an interlocutor assoilzieing the defenders, holding that it was incompetent to pronounce a limited decree unless the pursuers restricted their summons, which they declined to do. Held (rev. the judgment) that it was competent to pronounce a limited decree, and that decree fell to be pronounced accordingly. Assets Co., Limited, v. Ogilvie, Jan. 23, 1897, p. 400.

Building Restrictions.

11. Right of disponee of vassal to enforce restrictions against vassal—Deviation from restrictions. Campbell v. Bremner, July 17, 1897, p. 1142.

Buildings on feu—Approval of plan by superior—Servitude of light—Implied grant.

12. A feued a piece of ground in a street to B, the feu-contract bearing that B was “now erecting” on the ground feued “a tenement, the plan of which has been approved by” the superior’s architect. A subsequently feued the adjoining ground to C, who applied to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect upon it buildings which, if built, would have entirely excluded the light of the back windows of B's tenement. B opposed the application on the plea that the superior, having by his architect approved of the plan of his tenement, must be held to have conferred upon him a servitude of light over the adjoining ground for the windows shewn on the plan. The Court repelled the plea, holding that the superior's approval of the plan did not bind him to warrant the lights of all the windows shewn thereon. King v. Barnetson, Oct. 31, 1896, p. 81.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Privilege conferred on vassal to use vacant ground adjoining feu—Reservation of right to curtail vacant ground by building thereon—Extent of reserved right.

13. A feued a building stance to B, with the privilege of using a piece of vacant ground behind it, which was bounded on one side by certain brick buildings facing C Street belonging to A. The feu-contract contained a declaration that, "as the brick buildings are more narrow from back to front than the permanent buildings in C Street to be built upon the site of the said brick houses will be when C Street is feued, the said back ground will thus be curtailed," and that B should have no claim against A for this restriction. A subsequently feued the back ground and the ground on which the brick buildings stood to C, who applied to the Dean of Guild for warrant to pull down the existing buildings and erect in their place permanent buildings of considerably greater depth than the original buildings. The plans shewed that the proposed new buildings would materially injure the lights and ventilation of the buildings on B's feu. B opposed the application on the plea that the proposed buildings would be an unreasonable encroachment on his rights in the back ground. The Court repelled the plea on the ground that B's title imposed no limitation on the depth of the permanent buildings, the erection of which it contemplated. King v. Barnetson, Oct. 31, 1896, p. 81.

Lease—Power to resume lands.

14. Feu of lands resumed—Liability of feuar to compensate tenant—County Council—District Committee—Hospital—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 39 and 116. District Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanark v. Marshall, Nov. 10, 1896, p. 139.

SUPERFLUOUS LANDS. See Railway, 3.

SUSPENSION. See Interdict—Justiciary Cases, 19—Process, 40, 41—Trust, 17.

TEINDS. Augmentation—Procedure where dispute as to the existence of sufficient free teind.

In a process of augmentation the heritors admitted the existence of free teind, but denied that it was sufficient to meet the augmentation craved, and moved for an order on the minister to lodge a condescendence of the free teind which he alleged to exist. The Court granted the augmentation craved, leaving the question whether sufficient free teind existed or not to be determined in the process of locality. Minister of Peebles v. Heritors of Peebles, Jan. 8, 1897, p. 293.

TIME. See Justiciary Cases, 11—Process, 30.

TITLE TO SUE. See Assignment—Bankruptcy, 3, 4, 6—Executor, 2—Lease, 3.

TRADE-MARK. Jurisdiction—Petition for Rectification of Register of Trade-Marks—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

1. Held by Lord Kincairney, Ordinary, that he had jurisdiction to entertain a petition for rectification of the Register of Trade-Marks by a person aggrieved. Herbert v. Cowie Brothers & Co., Jan. 16, 1897, p. 361.

TRADE-MARK—Continued.

2. Held by Lord Kincairney, Ordinary, that a person aggrieved by an entry in the Register of Trade-Marks is not excluded by the lapse of five years from the date of the entry from presenting a petition for rectification of the register. Herbert v. Cowie Brothers & Co., Jan. 16, 1897, p. 361.

Similarity—Risk of native purchaser in foreign market being misled—Interdict in general terms.

3. A merchant who exported biscuits for sale in Burmah, and elsewhere abroad, and whose registered trade-mark was an architectural drawing, shewing the front elevation of Glasgow Town Hall, brought an action to have another merchant interdicted "from in any way using in connection with the sale of biscuits" the pursuers' trade-mark, or any mark substantially the same. It was proved that the defender exported biscuits for sale in Burmah, under a label which contained a picture, drawn in perspective, shewing the front and one of the sides of Glasgow Town Hall. It was admitted that a purchaser at home was not likely to mistake the one design for the other, but there was evidence, however, that the similarity was such as was calculated to mislead native purchasers in the Burmese market. It was not proved that anyone either at home or abroad had in fact been misled. The Court refused the interdict craved. Cowie Brothers & Co. v. Herbert, Jan. 16, 1897, p. 353.

TRADE NAME. Infringement of trade name—Measure of damages—Necessity for proving specific damage.

- A firm of wholesale whisky merchants brought an action against a public-house keeper for interdict against the defender selling whisky as of the pursuers' manufacture or blending which was not of their manufacture or blending, and for £500 as damages on account of such sales. The defender admitted that the pursuers were entitled to interdict, but he maintained that he was liable in nominal damages only, in respect that the pursuers had not proved special damage. The Court held it to be proved that he had fraudulently sold whisky which was not the pursuers' under the pursuers' name in order to discourage the sale of their whisky. There was no evidence that, after the defender's tenancy of his public-house commenced, the total sale of the pursuers' whisky had diminished in the town in which the public-house was situated. Held that the fair inference was that the defender's fraudulent conduct had produced the result which it was intended to produce of substantially injuring the pursuers' trade, and that in the circumstances the damages fell to be assessed at £100. Thomson & Co. v. Daily, July 20, 1897, p. 1173.

TRAMWAY. Nuisance—Police—Street—Snow and Salt—Interdict—Actio popularis.

1. A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the street by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines. In a suspension and interdict brought by a member of the public to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, the tramway company pleaded that the operations complained of were within their statutory rights. It was proved that the operations of the tramway company created a nuisance to the complainer and to the public using the streets for horse traffic. Held (in rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the statutory powers given to the tramway company to use the streets did not authorise them to create a nuisance, and that the complainer was entitled to an interdict against the company removing snow from the tramway lines in certain streets, and from scattering salt, warrant to erect upon it buildings which, if built, would have entirely excluded the light of the back windows of B's tenement. B opposed the application on the plea that the superior, having by his architect approved of the plan of his tenement, must be held to have conferred upon him a servitude of light over the adjoining ground for the windows shewn on the plan. The Court repelled the plea, holding that the superior's approval of the plan did not bind him to warrant the lights of all the windows shewn thereon. King v. Barnetson, Oct. 31, 1896, p. 81.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Privilege conferred on vassal to use vacant ground adjoining feu—Reservation of right to curtail vacant ground by building thereon—Extent of reserved right.

13. A feued a building stance to B, with the privilege of using a piece of vacant ground behind it, which was bounded on one side by certain brick buildings facing C Street belonging to A. The feu-contract contained a declaration that, "as the brick buildings are more narrow from back to front than the permanent buildings in C Street to be built upon the site of the said brick houses will be when C Street is feued, the said back ground will thus be curtailed," and that B should have no claim against A for this restriction. A subsequently feued the back ground and the ground on which the brick buildings stood to C, who applied to the Dean of Guild for warrant to pull down the existing buildings and erect in their place permanent buildings of considerably greater depth than the original buildings. The plans shewed that the proposed new buildings would materially injure the lights and ventilation of the buildings on B's feu. B opposed the application on the plea that the proposed buildings would be an unreasonable encroachment on his rights in the back ground. The Court repelled the plea on the ground that B's title imposed no limitation on the depth of the permanent buildings, the erection of which it contemplated. King v. Barnetson, Oct. 31, 1896, p. 81.

Lease—Power to resume lands.

14. Feu of lands resumed—Liability of feuar to compensate tenant—County Council—District Committee—Hospital—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 39 and 116. District Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanark v. Marshall, Nov. 10, 1896, p. 139.

SUPERFLUOUS LANDS. See Railway, 3.

SUSPENSION. See Interdict—Judiciary Cases, 19—Process, 40, 41—Trust, 17.

TEINDS. Augmentation—Procedure where dispute as to the existence of sufficient free teind.

In a process of augmentation the heritors admitted the existence of free teind, but denied that it was sufficient to meet the augmentation craved, and moved for an order on the minister to lodge a condescendence of the free teind which he alleged to exist. The Court granted the augmentation craved, leaving the question whether sufficient free teind existed or not to be determined in the process of locality. Minister of Peebles v. Heritors of Peebles, Jan. 8, 1897, p. 293.

TIME. See Judiciary Cases, 11—Process, 30.

TITLE TO SUE. See Assignment—Bankruptcy, 3, 4, 6—Executor, 2—Lease, 3.

TRADE-MARK. Jurisdiction—Petition for Rectification of Register of Trade-Marks—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

1. Held by Lord Kincairney, Ordinary, that he had jurisdiction to entertain a petition for rectification of the Register of Trade-Marks by a person aggrieved. Herbert v. Cowie Brothers & Co., Jan. 16, 1897, p. 361.

TRADE-MARK—Continued.

2. Held by Lord Kincairney, Ordinary, that a person aggrieved by an entry in the Register of Trade-Marks is not excluded by the lapse of five years from the date of the entry from presenting a petition for rectification of the register. Herbert v. Cowie Brothers & Co., Jan. 16, 1897, p. 361.

Similarity—Risk of native purchaser in foreign market being misled—Interdict in general terms.

3. A merchant who exported biscuits for sale in Burmah, and elsewhere abroad, and whose registered trade-mark was an architectural drawing, shewing the front elevation of Glasgow Town Hall, brought an action to have another merchant interdicted "from in any way using in connection with the sale of biscuits" the pursuers' trade-mark, or any mark substantially the same. It was proved that the defender exported biscuits for sale in Burmah, under a label which contained a picture, drawn in perspective, shewing the front and one of the sides of Glasgow Town Hall. It was admitted that a purchaser at home was not likely to mistake the one design for the other, but there was evidence, however, that the similarity was such as was calculated to mislead native purchasers in the Burmese market. It was not proved that anyone either at home or abroad had in fact been misled. The Court refused the interdict craved. Cowie Brothers & Co. v. Herbert, Jan. 16, 1897, p. 353.

TRADE NAME. Infringement of trade name—Measure of damages—Necessity for proving specific damage.

- A firm of wholesale whisky merchants brought an action against a public-house keeper for interdict against the defender selling whisky as of the pursuers' manufacture or blending which was not of their manufacture or blending, and for £500 as damages on account of such sales. The defender admitted that the pursuers were entitled to interdict, but he maintained that he was liable in nominal damages only, in respect that the pursuers had not proved special damage. The Court held it to be proved that he had fraudulently sold whisky which was not the pursuers' under the pursuers' name in order to discourage the sale of their whisky. There was no evidence that, after the defender's tenancy of his public-house commenced, the total sale of the pursuers' whisky had diminished in the town in which the public-house was situated. Held that the fair inference was that the defender's fraudulent conduct had produced the result which it was intended to produce of substantially injuring the pursuers' trade, and that in the circumstances the damages fell to be assessed at £100. Thomson & Co. v. Daily, July 20, 1897, p. 1173.

TRAMWAY. Nuisance—Police—Street—Snow and Salt—Interdict—Actio popularis.

1. A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the street by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines. In a suspension and interdict brought by a member of the public to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, the tramway company pleaded that the operations complained of were within their statutory rights. It was proved that the operations of the tramway company created a nuisance to the complainer and to the public using the streets for horse traffic. Held (in rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the statutory powers given to the tramway company to use the streets did not authorise them to create a nuisance, and that the complainer was entitled to an interdict against the company removing snow from the tramway lines in certain streets, and from scattering salt, in the manner hitherto practised by them to the nuisance of the complainer and of the public using the streets for the purpose of traffic with horses. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co., Dec. 14, 1896, H. L., p. 8.

TRAMWAY—Continued.

Lease—Relief—Public Burdens—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 6.

2. By a contract bearing to be a "lease" the Corporation of Glasgow "let" to a tramway company the sole right to use carriages with flange wheels on the whole tramways authorised to be formed by the Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870, for the space of twenty-three years, on condition (1) that the company should pay interest on the sum expended by the Corporation in making the tramways and certain other annual payments during the lease; and (2) that the company should pay to the Corporation "the expense of borrowing, management, &c. [sic], and this provision shall be so construed as to keep the Corporation free from all expenses whatever in connection with the said tramways." As the lease extended beyond twenty-one years the company were entered in the Valuation-roll as owners of the tramways at their annual value, and assessed accordingly. Held (1) that the contract was a lease of a heritable subject, and (2) that the obligation to free the Corporation of all expenses in connection with the tramways did not apply to assessments for which the Corporation was liable as owners of the tramways. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Corporation of City of Glasgow, March 4, 1897, p. 628.

See Servitude, 1.

TRANSACTION. See Executor, 3—Judicial Factor, 1.

TRESPASS. See Justiciary Cases, 31, 32, 33.

TRUST. Constitution—Trust-deed by a woman before marriage for behoof of spouse in life and children in fee—Revocation.

1. In an action brought by a wife, with the consent of the husband, a year after the marriage, there being no children, for declarator that a deed was revocable by her, held that the deed was revocable by the wife, with consent of her husband, in respect that it was unilateral and executed without reference to any contract of marriage, and that there were no beneficiaries in existence other than the spouses. Watt v. Watson, Jan. 16, 1897, p. 330.

Resignation of Trustee—Nobile Officium.

2. Circumstances in which the Court authorised a testamentary trustee to resign office on repayment of a legacy he had received. Orphoot, May 27, 1897, p. 871.

Personal liability of trustee—Culpa lata—Failure to sue co-trustee for trust-funds misappropriated by him—Defence that no loss resulted from failure.

3. In February 1895 A, a trustee, discovered that B, his co-trustee, who acted as agent for the trust, had retained in his own hands trust-money amounting to £150 which he had been instructed to place on deposit-receipt with a bank. A at once applied to B for repayment of the amount, and continued at intervals to press for repayment, but he took no legal proceedings against B, although about midsummer he became suspicious that B was in pecuniary difficulties. A also took no steps to prevent B intruding further with the trust funds, and at Whitsunday 1895 B collected the rent of a heritable property belonging to the trust-estate, and retained it for his own purposes. In November 1895 A was preparing to take legal proceedings against B when B became bankrupt. Held (1) that A was guilty of culpa lata in not taking legal proceedings against B without delay for recovery of the £150, but that he was not liable to repay that sum to the trust-estate in respect that it was proved that nothing would have been recovered from B if proceedings had been taken against him ; (2) that A was guilty of culpa lata in not taking immediate steps, on discovering B's misconduct, to prevent him intromitting further with the trust funds, and that he was liable to repay to the trust-estate the amount of the Whitsunday rent which B had appropriated. Millar's Trustees v. Polson, July 10, 1897, p. 1038.

TRUST—Continued.

Personal liability of trustee—Damages for delay in payment of money—Interest.

4. A widow raised an action against testamentary trustees for payment of £11,000, as damages on the ground that heritable properties belonging to her had been brought to a forced sale through the fault of the defenders in withholding payment of sums due to her. Held (1) that the action was not relevant, as the pursuer had not set forth circumstances inferring liability on the part of the defenders for damages for delay other than interest ; and (2) that the pursuer's acceptance of interest excluded the claim for damages. Roissard v. Scott's Trustees, May 21, 1897, p. 861.

Personal liability of trustee—Claim against trustees for interest in respect of failure to invest trust funds—Count, reckoning, and payment—Competency.

5. In an action of accounting brought against testamentary trustees jointly by certain beneficiaries, the trustees produced accounts which shewed that the trust funds had been allowed to remain in bank for a number of years on deposit-receipt. The pursuers contended that the trust-estate fell to be credited with the additional interest which would have been realised if the funds had been invested on heritable security. The defenders maintained that this was a claim for damages for breach of trust, which could not be entertained in an action of accounting. Held that it was competent to entertain the question of the liability of the defenders for a higher rate of interest in the action of accounting. Melville v. Noble's Trustees, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 243.

Personal liability of trustee—Interest—Trust funds lodged in bank on deposit-receipt—Liability of trustees for higher interest—Indemnity clause.

6. In an action of accounting by beneficiaries against trustees it was proved that, without deliberately considering the question of investment, the defenders had allowed the trust funds to remain in bank on deposit-receipt for a period of nineteen years from April 1875, during which they yielded interest at the average rate of $2\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. It was proved that during this period safe investments affording over 3 per cent might have been obtained ; but that the expense of investment was saved, that for five years the defenders required to keep money in hand to meet advances to beneficiaries, and that deposit in bank would have been necessary while investments or renewals of investments were being considered. The trust-deed provided that the trustees "shall no ways be liable for any omissions in management." Held (1) that the trustees had failed to make a proper investment of the trust funds ; and (2) that they were bound in their trust accounts to debit themselves with interest at 3 per cent on the whole funds for the whole period. Melville v. Noble's Trustees, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 243.

Powers—Sale—General power and prohibition against selling a particular subject—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 3.

7. A truster in his settlement gave his trustees general power of sale. In a codicil he directed,—“As I consider that the value of property in B will improve, I direct and appoint my trustees to hold and retain the property known as K . . . and not to sell or dispose of the same before the youngest of my sons attains twenty-one years of age.” In a petition brought by the trustees before the youngest child had attained majority, under the 3d section of the Trusts Act, 1867, for power to sell the property dealt with in the codicil in the interests of the trust-estate, the Court refused the petition on the ground that, assuming that a sale was "expedient for the execution of the trust," it was "inconsistent with the intention thereof." Marshall's Trustees, Jan. 30, 1897, p. 478.

TRUST—Continued.

Powers—Statute—Retrospective operation—Trusts (Scotland) 1867, sec. 2—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, sec. 2.

8. Opinion (per Lord Kincairney) that section 2 of the Trusts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1884, was declaratory, and therefore retrospective in its effects. Scott v. Craig's Representatives, Jan. 29, 1897, p. 462.

Investments—Investment on security of harbour rates—Real or Heritable Security—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, secs. 3 (b), 10 and 12.

9. A curator bonis lent a sum to Greenock Harbour Trustees, a corporation consisting of the Magistrates and Council, and nine elected trustees, on a debenture, in which they assigned to the creditor "the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust." Held that the investment was not on real security nor on a debenture granted by a municipal corporation in the sense of the Act. Held further that it was not a proper investment at common law in respect that the revenue of the trust from dues, &c., was precarious. Cowan's Trustees v. Ferrie's Curator Bonis, Feb. 26, 1897, p. 590.

Title to Sue—Expenses.

10. A, who had as trustee on a sequestrated estate raised an action and obtained from a Lord Ordinary a decree for expenses, was afterwards removed from office. The defender having reclaimed, and the new trustee having declined to sist himself, A presented an application to be sisted on the ground that he had an interest in the question of expenses. The Court refused the application. Mackenzie v. Fowler, July 13, 1897, p. 1080.

Foreign—Statute—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867.

11. The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, does not apply to English trusts. Trustees under an English trust which embraced a heritable property in Scotland presented a petition to the Court under section 3 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, for authority to sell the Scots property. The Court refused the petition on the ground that the Act did not apply to English trusts. Carruthers' Trustees—Allan's Trustees, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 238.

Foreign—Nobile Officium.

12. Trustees under an English trust, having obtained the sanction of the High Court of Justice in England, petitioned the Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium, to authorise the sale of certain heritable subjects belonging to the trust-estate, which were situated in Scotland. The Court granted the petition. Allan's Trustees, March 13, 1897, p. 718.
13. Petition by trustees acting under a Scottish trust-settlement for authority to pay the income of legacies to the fathers of minor beneficiaries who were domiciled in England, and from whom, according to the law of England, a valid discharge could not be obtained, refused on the ground that the Court had no power to grant the authority craved. Atherstone's Trustees, Oct. 24, 1896, p. 39.

Law-agent of Trust.

14. Right of law-agent to have his account taxed by local auditor. Turner v. Fraser's Trustees, March 6, 1897, p. 673.

Law-agent of Trust—Law-agent's business account—Taxation—Scale of charges for attending meetings of trustees when law-agent himself a trustee.

15. In taxing the business account of a law-agent to a trust, the Auditor restricted his charges as a law-agent for attending meetings of the trustees in respect that the law-agent was himself a trustee. The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) having repelled an objection to the Auditor's report, the trustees reclaimed. The Court refused the reclaiming note. Turner v. Fraser's Trustees, March 6, 1897, p. 673.

TRUST—Continued.

Law-agent of Trust—Beneficiary's right to taxation of law-agent's business account of trust after settlement.

16. A beneficiary having right to a share of residue under a trust-settlement granted a discharge to the trustees, and afterwards, on discovering the sum paid to the trustees' law-agent for law expenses and commission, raised an action of accounting against the trustees for the purpose of having the law-agent's account taxed, and any overcharge restored to the estate—the pursuer alleging that the charges were excessive. Held that the pursuer was not precluded from raising the action by the discharge. M'Farlane v. M'Farlane's Trustees, Feb. 23, 1897, p. 574.

Cautioner for trustee—Suspension—Expenses.

17. The complainer in a suspension of a charge upon a bill having died, his widow, one of his trustees, was at her own request sisted as complainer in his place as his "trustee," and found caution, her cautioner becoming bound "that she shall, as trustee foresaid, pay" the sum in the bill "in full in the event of there being a sufficiency of trust funds, or rateably along with the other creditors" of the trustor "in the event of his estate proving insufficient to pay his creditors in full," and also "that payment shall be made of whatever sum the said Lords shall modify in name of damages and expenses in case of wrongous suspending." The Court ultimately repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the complainer liable in expenses "as trustee." In an action by the charger against the cautioner, held that whatever the liability of the complainer might be, the cautioner was liable to the charger in payment of the whole expenses. Stewart v. Forbes, July 15, 1897, p. 1112.

See Bankruptcy—Charitable and Educational Bequests and Trusts.

VALUATION ACTS. Valuation-roll—Election Law—Lodger Franchise—Evidence of value—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 4—Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885, sec. 14.

1. A person claimed to be registered as a lodger in respect of the occupation of two rooms and a surgery in a house. The rent for the furnished lodgings payable by the claimant was 8s. a week, amounting to £20, 16s. per annum. An objection was taken that the yearly rent of the whole house (as shewn by the Valuation-roll) was £5, and that the value of the lodgings, which formed only part of the house, could not therefore be of the clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10. The Sheriff, proceeding on the rent actually paid for the lodgings, held that as matter of fact they were of the statutory value, and admitted the claim. The Court refused an appeal, holding that the entry in the Valuation-roll was only an element in the proof, and that the Sheriff was not thereby precluded from forming his own judgment on the value of the rooms occupied by the claimant, and that there was no ground in law for interfering with the Sheriff's decision on the question of fact. Kellie v. Little, Jan. 19, 1897, p. 379.

Subjects—Erections by lessee—Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1895, sec. 4—Exemptions 2 and 3.

2. A tenant of certain seams of fireclay and quarries of rotten rock and freestone rock under a lease which stipulated for a fixed rent or for a royalty on every ton of these minerals carried away, erected certain kilns in which the rotten rock and freestone rock, after being quarried, was dried, and also certain buildings containing two boilers, an engine, and pan-mills, in which the fireclay, rotten rock, and freestone rock were ground. Held (1) that these erections did not fall within the meaning of exemption 2, in respect that they were used for converting the minerals on which the royalty was payable into a finished product; and (2) that they did not fall under exemption 3, in respect that the royalty was not calculated upon the finished product, but upon the raw mineral. Gartverrie Fireclay Co. v. Assessor for Lanarkshire, March 17, 1897, p. 738.

VALUATION ACTS—Continued.

Value—Consideration other than the rent—Tenant a company of which landlord a partner—Hotel—Adequacy of rent—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 6.

3. Where a hotel was bona fide let to a firm consisting of the owner and two other partners having equal interests in the profits of the hotel, held that the mere fact that the owner was one of the partners did not displace the rule that the rent stated in the lease was the measure of value. M'Lachlan v. Assessor for Ayr, March 17, 1897, p. 734.

Value—Apportionment of Value—Special District—Farm buildings within Special District—Principle of Valuation—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, sec. 45, subsec. 1.

4. Of a farm of 223 acres, 9 acres, including the farm-house and steadings, lay within a special water supply and drainage district. The Assessor, in valuing the 9 acres, included the value of the buildings thereon. Held that the farm, with the farm buildings, should have been valued as an unum quid, and the amount distributed proportionally to acreage. Forbes Irvine v. Assessor for Aberdeenshire, March 17, 1897, p. 741.

Value—Crofter—Fair Rent—Crofter Proprietor—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, sec. 6.

5. A crofter, the rent of whose farm had been fixed at a fair rent by the Crofters Commission, purchased his holding. The Assessor, assuming that the fair rent represented only the landlord's interest in the croft, added thereto, in fixing the valuation, a sum representing the annual value of permanent improvements on the holding. Held that the valuation was right. Mackay v. Assessor for Sutherland, March 17, 1897, p. 737.

See Public Burden.

WAIVER. See Administration of Justice, 1—Insurance, 5.

WRIT. Authentication—Deed partly written and partly printed—Attestation—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 39.

1. A person died leaving a will and codicil partly written and partly printed, bearing to be subscribed by herself and attested by two witnesses, but the witnesses' designations were neither contained in the deeds nor appended to their signatures. Her executor presented a petition under section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, stating that the will and codicil were subscribed and witnessed by the persons whom he mentioned in the petition, and craving a proof, and thereafter to have it declared that the deeds were subscribed by the grantor and by the persons by whom the deeds bore to be attested. The Court allowed a proof by commission, and thereafter found and declared as craved. Nisbet, Jan. 23, 1897, p. 411.

Delivery—Registration—Gratuitous Deed.

2. The grantor of a gratuitous deed wrote to the law-agent who had prepared it, requesting him "by way of delivering" the deed to the grantee, to register it in the books of Council and Session. Held that the registration of the deed was equivalent to delivery. Obers v. Paton's Trustees, March 17, 1897, p. 719.

WRIT—Continued.Proof—Writ of Agent.

3. Held that the accession by a creditor to a composition agreement may be proved by the writ of his duly authorised agent. Henry v. Strachan & Spence, July 10, 1897, p. 1045.

Proving the Tenor—Adminicles.

4. Circumstances in which the Court refused to grant decree of proving the tenor of a deed, in respect that no evidence of the particular terms of the essential clauses of the deed was adduced. Incorporation of Skinners and Furriers in Edinburgh v. Baxter's Heir, March 17, 1897, p. 744.

WRONGOUS APPREHENSION. See Reparation, 4.

1276 CASES REFERRED TO JUDICIALLY. [FOURTH SERIES.

	Page
Dun v. Johnston - - - - 1818, Hume, 451 - -	602
Duncan v. Laing - - - - 1888, 16 R., J. C. 20 - J. C. 23
Edmond v. Grant - - - - 1853, 15 D. 703 - -	719
Edwards v. Dennis - - - - 1885, L. R., 30 Ch. Div. 454	361
Elder's Trustees v. Elder - - - - 1895, 22 R. 505 - -	526
Falkner v. Ritchie - - - - 1814, 2 M. & S. 290 - -	893
Farina v. Home - - - - 1846, 16 M. & W. 119	758
Ferguson v. Murray - - - - 1853, 16 D. 260 - -	6
Fleming's Trustees v. M'Hardy - - - - 1892, 19 R. 542 - -	719, 920
Fletcher v. Taylor - - - - 1855, 25 L. J. C. P. 65	861
Forbes v. Morrison - - - - 1845, 7 D. 853 - -	6
Foulger v. Steadman - - - - 1872, L. R., 8 Q. B. 65	H. L. 44
Fraser v. Downie - - - - 1877, 4 R. 942 - -	1061
Fraser v. Wilson - - - - 1850, 13 D. 289 - -	156
Gemmell v. Weir - - - - 1897, supra , J. C. 23 - J. C. 44
Gibson v. Pearson - - - - 1833, 11 S. 656 - -	6
Goetze v. Aders - - - - 1874, 2 R. 150 - -	719
Gordon v. Campbell - - - - 1842, 1 Bell's App. 428	6, 1112
Gordon's Trustees v. Melrose - - - - 1870, 8 Macph. 906 - -	388
Goskirk v. Edinburgh Railway Station Access Co. - - - -
- - - - 1863, 2 Macph. 383 - -	1098
Grainger's Curator - - - - 1876, 3 R. 479 - -	590
Grant v. Campbell's Representatives - - - - 1764, M. 14,690 - -	462
Grassick v. Farquharson - - - - 1846, 8 D. 1073 - -	1009
Greenlees' Trustees v. Greenlees - - - - 1894, 22 R. 136 - -	666, 904
Greenock Harbour Trustees - - - - 1888, 15 R. 543 - -	590
Greig v. Adamson and Craig - - - - 1865, 3 Macph. 575 - -	169
Grey v. Pearson - - - - 1857, 6 H. L. Cases, 61	619
Hadley v. Baxendale - - - - 1854, 9 Excheq. 341 - -	861
Haldane v. Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Co. - - - -
- - - - 1881, 8 R. 669 and 1003	590
Hall - - - - 1869, 7 Macph. 667 - -	238
Hamilton v. Western Bank - - - - 1856, 19 D. 152 - -	758
Harkes v. Mouat - - - - 1862, 24 D. 701 - -	156
Harman v. Powell - - - - 1891, 60 L. J., Q. B. - -	628
Harris v. Williams - - - - 6 T. L. R. 47 - -	J. C. 9
Harvey v. Lindsay - - - - 1875, 2 R. 980 - -	35
Hay's Trustees v. Hay Milne - - - - 1873, 11 Macph. 694 - -	478
Henderson - - - - 1871, 11 Macph. 985 - -	741
Henderson v. Nimmo - - - - 1840, 2 D. 869 - -	400
Henderson v. Robb - - - - 1889, 16 R. 341 - -	462
Heriot's Trust, Governors of, v. Drumshough Baths Co. - - - -
- - - - 1890, 17 R. 937 - -	914
Heritable Securities Co. v. Wingate - - - - 1880, 7 R. 1094 - -	120
Highland Railway Co. v. Heritors of Kinclaven - - - -
- - - - 1878, 8 Macph. 858 - -	704
Hill v. Merchant Company - - - - Jan. 17, 1815, F. C. - -	914
Hinton v. Connell's Trustees - - - - 1883, 10 R. 1110 - -	462
Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees - - - - 1881, 8 R., H. L. 95 - -	1061
Hood v. Darling - - - - 1808, Hume, 59 - -	1009
Hooper v. Bourne - - - - 1880, L. R., App. Cas. 1	1156
Howat's Trustees v. Howat - - - - 1869, 8 Macph. 337 - -	105
Howman v. Mackie - - - - 1891, 18 R., J. C. 30 - J. C. 65
Hunter v. Macnaughton - - - - 1894, 21 R. 850 - -	156
Hunter v. Palmer - - - - 1825, 2 S. 586 - -	719

	Page
Jack v. Nairne - - - - -	1887, 14 R., J. C. 20 - J. C. 32
Johnson v. Credit Lyonnais Co. - - -	1877, L. R., 3 C. P. D. 32 758
Jones v. Foxall - - - - -	1852, 15 Beav. 388 - 243
Jones v. Taylor - - - - -	1858, 1 E. & E. 20 - H. L. 44
Kay v. Wilson's Trustees - - - - -	1850, 12 D. 845 - - 6
Kennedy v. Murray - - - - -	1869, 7 Macph. 1001 - 549
Kerbechill - - - - -	1886, M. 9585 - - 1047
Ker's Trustees v. Ker - - - - -	1895, 23 R. 317 - - 330
Kerr v. Phyn - - - - -	1893, 20 R., J. C. 60 - J. C. 3
Kilmalcolm, Minister of, v. Heritors -	1875, 3 R. 32 - - 606
Lag - - - - -	1834, M. 14,689 - - 462
Laird v. Anderson - - - - -	1895, 23 R., J. C. 14 - J. C. 73
Law v. Humphrey - - - - -	1876, 3 R. 1192 - - 6
Lawson v. Jopp - - - - -	1853, 15 D. 392 - - 543
Lawson's Trustees v. British Linen Co.	1874, 1 R. 1065 - - 976
Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier - - - -	1895, L. R. [1895], A. C. 517 973
Le Neve v. Hay - - - - -	1824, 2 Sh. App. 395 - H. L. 1
Liddell's Trustees v. Warr & Co. - -	1893, 20 R. 989 - - 120
Lindsay's Trustees v. Lindsay - - -	1880, 8 R. 281 - - 904
Lloyd's Curator - - - - -	1877, 5 R. 289 - - 590
Low v. Low - - - - -	1891, 19 R. 115 - - 973
Low v. Wedgewood - - - - -	Dec. 6, 1814, F. C. - 1
Lowe v. Taylor - - - - -	1843, 5 D. 1261 - - 471
Lowson v. Ford - - - - -	1866, 4 Macph. 631 - 189
London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Evershed - - - - -	1878, L. R., 3 App. Cas. 1029 687
London and South-Western Railway v. Blackmore - - - - -	{ 1870, L. R., 4 Eng. and Ir. App. 610 - - 1056
Macarthur v. Campbell - - - - -	1896, 23 R., J. C. 81 - J. C. 88
M'Bain v. Wallace - - - - -	1881, 8 R., H. L. 106 - 120
M'Callum v. Macdonald - - - - -	1853, 15 D. 535 - - 1047
Macdonald v. Hall - - - - -	1893, 20 R., H. L. 88 - 619
Macdonell's Trustees v. Oregonian Rail- way Co. - - - - -	1884, 11 R. 912 - - 207
M'Dougall v. City of Glasgow Bank -	1879, 6 R. 1089 - - 330
M'Ewan v. Smith - - - - -	1849, 6 Bell's App. - 758
M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee - - -	1891, 18 R. 576 - - 47, 837
M'Gibbon v. Rankin - - - - -	1871, 9 Macph. 423 - 1061
Mackenzie v. Mackenzie - - - - -	1886, 13 R. 507 - - 462
Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees -	1878, 5 R. 1027 - - 330
M'Kinnon v. Nanson - - - - -	1868, 6 Macph. 974 - 758
M'Nee v. Brown & Co. - - - - -	1889, 26 S. L. R. 459 - 1098
Madell v. Thomas & Co. - - - - -	L. R. [1891], 1 Q. B. 230 120
Maffett v. Stewart - - - - -	1887, 14 R. 506 - 944
Maitland v. Allan - - - - -	1896, 34 S. L. R. 148 - 1098
Malcolm v. M'Intyre - - - - -	1877, 5 R. 22 - - 855
Manchester, Mayor of, v. M'Adam - -	L. R. [1896], A. C. 500 930
Marwick v. Codlin - - - - -	1874, L. R., 9 Q. B. 509 J. C. 42
Mason v. Tait - - - - -	1851, 13 D. 1347 - 156
Melrose v. Hastie - - - - -	1851, 13 D. 880 - - 758
Menzies v. Murray - - - - -	1875, 2 R. 507 - - 330
Middleton v. Lealie - - - - -	1894, 21 R. 781 - - 400
Millar v. Endowment Committee - -	1896, 23 R. 557 - - 400
Miller v. Linton - - - - -	1880, 15 R., J. C. 37 - J. C. 28
Miller v. Muirhead - - - - -	1894, 21 R. 656 - - 269
Miller's Trustees v. Miller - - - -	1890, 18 R. 301 - - 666
Milne v. Walker - - - - -	1893, 21 R. 155 - - 156

		Page
Milne's Trustees v. Ormiston's Trustees	1893, 20 R. 523 - -	297
Mitchell v. Motherwall - - -	1888, 16 R. 122 - .	51
Mitchell v. Rodger - - -	1834, 12 S. 802 - -	920
Mitchell's Trustees v. Gladstone -	1894, 21 R. 586 - -	120
Montrose, Duke of, v. M'Intyre -	1848, 10 D. 896 - -	216
Montrose, Marquis of - - -	1695, 4 Br. Sup. 277 .	1047
Morison & Milne v. Massa - - -	1866, 5 Macph. 130 -	297
Morton v. The Duke - - -	1557, M. 14,686 - -	462
Muir v. City of Glasgow Bank - -	1879, 6 R., H. L. 21 -	6
Muir v. Collett - - -	1862, 24 D. 1119 -	543
Muirhead v. Muirhead - - -	1890, 17 R., H. L. 45 -	458
Muldoon v. Pringle - - -	1882, 9 R. 915 - -	388
Murison v. Dick - - -	1854, 16 D. 529 - -	330
Murray v. M'Dougall - - -	1883, 10 R., J. C. 42 - J. C. 23
National Bank v. Forbes - - -	1858, 21 D. 79 - -	758
Niven v. Renton - - -	1888, 15 R., J. C. 42 - J. C. 32
Northern Assurance Co. v. Inland Revenue - - -	1889, 16 R. 461 - -	578
North-Western Bank v. Poynter -	1894, 22 R., H. L. 1 -	758
Orr's Trustees v. Tullis - - -	1870, 8 Macph. 936 -	120
Ovington v. M'Vicar - - -	1864, 2 Macph. 1066 -	880
Palmer v. Wick and Pultneytown Shipping Co., Limited - - -	1894, 21 R., H. L. 39 -	543
Patience v. Main, - - -	1885, L. R., 29 Ch. Div. 976	973
Pattison's Trustees v. Liston - -	1893, 20 R. 806 - -	120
Peacock v. Penson - - -	1848, 11 Beav. 355 -	400
Peggie v. Clark - - -	1868, 7 Macph. 89 -	747
Peterhead Granite Polishing Co. v. Parochial Board of Peterhead -	1880, 7 R. 536 - -	139
Peters v. Magistrates of Greenock -	1894, 21 R. 886 - -	606
Phipps v. London and North-Western Railway Co. - - -	L. R. [1892], 2 Q. B. 229	687
Piggott v. Stratton - - -	1860, 29 L. J. Ch. 1 -	400
Portobello, Assessor for, v. Mitchell & Sons - - -	1896, 23 R. 686 - -	738
Portobello Pier Co. v. Clift - - -	1877, 4 R. 685 - -	1030
Powell v. Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co. - - -	L. R. [1894], App. Cas. 8	361
Prentice v. Linton - - -	1883, 5 Coup. 210 - J. C. 23
Prentice v. London - - -	1875, L. R., 10 C. P. 679	483
Pretty v. Newbigging - - -	1854, 16 D. 667 - -	458
Pringle v. Anderson - - -	1868, 6 Macph. 982 -	330
Quin v. Gardner - - -	1888, 15 R. 776 - -	673
Rae v. Meek - - -	1888, 15 R. 1033 -	462
Ralph v. Carrick - - -	1879, L. R., 11 Ch. Div. 873	619
Ramsay v. Ramsay's Trustees - -	1871, 10 Macph. 120 -	330
Rangeley v. Midland Railway Co. -	1868, L. R., 3 Ch. App. 306	1156
Reed & M'Call v. Douglas - - -	June 11, 1814, F. C. -	543
Reid v. Morison - - -	1893, 20 R. 510 - -	719
Rennie v. Ritchie - - -	1845, 4 Bell's App. 221 -	330
Robertson v. Burdekin - - -	1843, 6 D. 17 - -	758
Robertson v. Caird - - -	1885, 13 R., J. C. 1 - J. C. 3
Robertson, Forsyth, & Co. v. Stewart, Smith, & Co. - - -	Feb. 10, 1809, F. C. -	893
Robertson v. North British Railway Co.	1874, 1 R. 1213 - -	1061
Robertson v. M'Intyre - - -	1882, 9 R. 772 - -	120

	Page
Robin v. Steward - - - -	1854, 14 C. B. 11 - 861
Robinson v. Mollett - - - -	1875, L. R., 7 Eng. and Ir. App. 802 - 944
Rogerson v. Barker - - - -	1833, 11 S. 563 - 462
Rolfe v. Thompson - - - -	L. R. [1892], 196 - J. C. 9
Ross v. Devine - - - -	1878, 5 R. 1015 - 462
Rouch v. Hall - - - -	1880, L. R., 6 Q. B. D. 17 - J. C. 9
Roy v. Turner - - - -	1891, 18 R. 717 - 30
Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans - -	1895, 23 R. 256 - 368
St Cuthberts v. Cramond - - -	1873, 1 R. 174 - 169
Schneider v. Provident Life Assurance Co. - - - -	1869, 1 American Rep. 157 - 56
Scott v. Patison - - - -	1826, 5 S. 172 - 6
Scottish Investment Trust Co. v. Inland Revenue - - - -	1893, 21 R. 262 - 578
Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen	1888, 16 R. 112 - 758
Shedden v. Wilson - - - -	1895, 23 R. 228 - 330
Shepherd v. Henderson - - -	1881, 7 R., H. L. 1 - 893
Shields v. Dalziel - - - -	1897, supra , p. 849 - 875
Sickens v. Irving - - - -	1859, 29 L. J. C. P. 25 - 530
Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited, v. General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited - - - -	1892, 19 R. 977 - 287
Small v. Hart - - - -	1886 13 R., J. C. 45 - J. C. 65
Smith v. Baker - - - -	L. R. [1891], A. C. 325 - 699
Smith v. Harrison & Co.'s Trustees	1893, 21 R. 330 - 602
Smith Brothers & Co. v. Rostron -	1860, 23 D. 140 - 51
Spragg v. Hammond - - - -	1820, 4 Moore, 431 - 628
Steel v. Steel - - - -	1888, 15 R. 896 - 973
Stewart v. Bunten - - - -	1878, 5 R. 1108 - 1061
Stewart v. Rose - - - -	1816, Hume, 229 - 602
Stewart v. Stewart - - - -	1839, M'L. & Rob. 401 - 216
Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart - -	1896, 23 R. 416 - 904
Stoddart v. Rutherford - - -	June 30, 1812, F. C. - 1047
Strachan v. McDougle - - - -	1835, 13 S. 954 - 758
Strain's Trustees v. Strain - - -	1893, 20 R. 1025 - 437
Stribling v. Halse - - - -	1885, L. R. 16 Q. B. D. 246 - 376
Stuart v. Bell - - - -	L. R. [1891], 2 Q. B. 341 - 1054
Stuart v. Henderson - - - -	1636, M. 9585 - 1047
Sutherland's Trustees - - - -	1892, 29 S. L. R. 903 - 478
Symington's Executor v. Galashiels Co-operative Store Co., Limited -	1894, 21 R. 371 - 483
Taylor's Trustee v. Paul - - -	1888, 15 R. 313 - 602
Thomson v. Whitehead - - - -	1862, 24 D. 331 - 297
Thomson's Trustees v. Muir - - -	1867, 5 Macph. 145 - 462
Tolmie v. Parochial Board of Urray	1890, 17 R. 1027 - 512
Trappes v. Meredith - - - -	1871, 10 Macph. 78 - 719
Union Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited	1886, 14 R., H. L. 1 - 1
Ure v. M'Cubbin - - - -	1857, 19 D. 758 - 51
Vickers v. Hertz - - - -	1871, 9 Macph., H. L. 65 - 758
Walker's Executor v. Walker - -	1878, 5 R. 965 - 499
Walker's Trustees v. Manson - -	1886, 13 R. 1198 - 1128
Wallace v. Culter Paper Mills Co., Limited	1892, 19 R. 915 - 699
Wallace v. Davies - - - -	1853, 15 D. 688 - 758

1280 CASES REFERRED TO JUDICIALLY. [FOURTH SERIES.]

	Page
Watt v. Roger's Trustees - - - 1890, 17 R. 1201 - -	462
Webster v. Brown - - - 1892, 19 R. 765 - -	849, 875
Weir's Trustees - - - 1877, 4 R. 876 - -	478
Welsh's Trustees v. Forbes - - - 1885, 12 R. 851 - -	1104
West Lothian Oil Co., Liquidators of, v. Mair - - - - - 1892, 20 R. 64 - -	120
White v. Steel - - - - - 1894, 21 R. 649 - -	6
White's Trustees v. White - - - 1896, 23 R. 836 - -	666
Whiteley v. Adams - - - - - 1863, 15 C. B. (n. s.) 392	1054
Whyte v. Simpson - - - - - 1862, 1 Macph. 72 - -	543
Whyte's Factor v. Whyte - - - 1891, 18 R. 376 - -	478
Wilkie's Trustees v. Wight's Trustees - 1893, 21 R. 199 - -	666
Williams v. Powell - - - - - 1852, 15 Beav. 461 - -	243
Williamson v. Boothby - - - - 1890, 17 R. 927 - -	330
Willis v. Wells - - - - - L. R. [1892], 2 Q. B. 225	483
Wilson v. Bartholomew - - - - 1860, 22 D. 1410 - -	855
Wilson v. Purvis - - - - - 1890, 18 R. 72 - -	1086
Wood v. Hamilton - - - - - 1789, 3 Pat. App. 148 - H. L. 1
Wragge's Trade Mark - - - - - 1885, L. R., 29 Chan. Div. 551	361
Young v. Gerrard - - - - - 1843, 6 D. 347 - -	1128
Young v. Robertson - - - - - 1862, 4 Macq. 314 - -	105
Young's Trustees - - - - - 1885, 12 R. 968 - -	1135
Young's Trustee v. M'Nab - - - 1883, 10 R. 1165 - -	619

Stanford Law Library

3 6105 062 686 972

